Lord Hammond now only muttered "the dickens" when Elsie's name was mentioned, and Lady Chase looked sad and sighed. Better than all this, Lord Hammond had returned to his allegtance to Pauline; in fact, he was more devoted to her than he had ever been. Her acting quite fascinated him; he had engaged her for four waltzes at the charity bah; nay they had a little plan for a secret stroil together in the hotel gardens if the moon shone as it had been shining the last few nights. The coronet, or at least the title which led to it, seemed very near indeed to Miss Bracegirdle that evening.

"I shall accomplish it," she said to herself, "if only I can hurry matters on and make him understand what a splendid lark it will be to steal a march upon these absurd relations of his, who wish to make him marry Lady Mary Montague. He feels that the world expects him to marry; but when he has married me he will only have himself to please, as I tell him, and I shall please myself, and become one of the most admirable women under the sun. I am sure it must be easy to practice all the virtues if one has an income of several thousands a year; and Arthur has already six thousand a year of his own, and a pretty house at Ken-ington. I should live there, and fill it ith lovely things, and I would soon set the fashion in toilets to—yes, to Europe," she added, with a sudden inspiration of ambitious vanity. He must give me six hundred a year as pin money. I should drive prettier ponies than Morjorle's, even if they cost five hundred pounds the pair. When I drive them in the park, and wear a fantastic costume of nale blue. and wear a fantastic costume of pale blue velvet and richest dark fur that I will design myself, and can see now in my mind's eye, all London will worship me. Strangers will ask who I am. Just at first excellent patterns of mothers of grown-up daughters, stout, stupid country squiresses up for the season in town, will wonder whether f am quite respectable; they will consider my style loud; they will think I am an Italian countess or a superb Russian of mysterious antecedents. Then they will be told that my home is a handsome mansion at Kensington, standing in its own grounds and ton, standing in its own grounds, and called Hammond House; that it is the suburban residence of Arthur, Lord Hammond, direct heir to the Earldom of Chase, and a rent roll of one hundred thousand a year; they will hear that I am Lady Arthur Hammond, future Countess of Chase; that the Chase diapatois of Breton French that she had learned in her childhood. Thus she was not afraid to raise her voice, and she walked rapidly about her pretty and luxurious sleeping room luxurious sleeping-room. Since Elsie's departure the slumbers of Miss Bracegirdle had been more placid; her mind was easier; she felt sure of winning Lord Hammond now. There were flowers in various vases, placed here and there, in this young lady's room. She was about to make a bouquet for herself She would have to dress for dinner and the ball at the same time, but the finishing touches would be put to her toilet and her bouquet arranged after dinner.

"I will be the belle tonight," she said to herself, with a complacent smile.
"That Marjorie's good looks are the good looks of a dairymaid, earl's proud daughter though she be, and though she would turn into marble, become a stone goddess. L suppose, if I married her brother. I hate her; I don't hate the old woman; she is weak and kind, and one can mold her so, like a pancake or a tart," and Pauline made grotesque gestures with her white hands. "All right," she said; presently. "Now I must dress for din-

And when Pauline had bathed her face And when Pauline had bathed her face in some cosmetic wash, and put some real lilies and blue wistaria in her flaxen hair, she attired herself in her glorious new ball dress. It was of ivory satin, embroidered with blue forget-me-nots; it was like the robe of a bride. This was the 'gift' of her father, Captain Bracegirdle, who, notwithstanding the fact that his circumstances were often desperate, and that his wife wore boots of which any woman of refinement would have been ashamed, yet contrived to pay Monbeen ashamed, yet contrived to pay Mon-sieur Worth a sum exceeding lifty pounds for this costume for his beloved Pauline. 'So I shall be the belle—the very belle—the ball," said Miss Bracegirdle, when the dress was on. She always dispensed with the assistance of English lady's-maids. "Ah how brilliant my complexion is when I have put on just that faint touch of rouge! how black my eyebrows! how long and thick my eyelashes! how glorious my wonderful flaxen hair. Ah! I am lovely—lovely—the lovellest woman in England—who can deny it!"

Indeed, Pauline resembled Queen Elizabeth in being at once a very clever and yet a very vain woman. When dinner yet a very vain woman. When dinner was announced she went in smiling. She wore the wonderful pearl necklace with the diamond clasp, and certainly she was a handsome, brilliant, distinguished-looking voing woman ing woman.

Marjorie was absolutely timple-

Lady Marjorie was absolutely timple-minded and innocent of guile. When she saw the brilliant Pauline, she said to her neighbor at the dinner table: "Monsieur Lafonte will be proud of Miss Bracegirdle tonight. She is splendid, and she seems devoted to him. How very happy they are! I hope they will marry soon."

Paul Lafonte did not feel at all happy.
His love for Pauline was of that absorbing and jealous kind which only a few concentrated and impassioned natures feel; his southern blood boiled in his veins at the mere thought that her smiles were really given to anytholy also Pauline feel; his southern blood boiled in his veins at the mere thought that her smiles were really given to anybody else. Pauline was so deeply cunning that as yet no suspecion of her secret filtation with Lord Hammond had entered anyone's head; only instinct whispered something—he hardly knew what—in Lafonte's ear.

Pauline sat next him, talked to him, smiled into his eyes, pulled a bonbon-cracker with him when the dessert was on the table. She hardly gave a glance to Lord Hammond, who was delighting one of the Misses Littlewood by paying her spasmodic attentions; and yet Lafonte felt uneasy. Something woke up in him that evening—something told him to watch; something told him that if he did he would find out a secret.

Lafonte was hendsome in a dark, somber, Spanish fashion, with clear, olive coloring; straight, rather long nose; narrow, shining, dark eyes, and closely-cut, glossy, raven hair. He was polite, and his manners had the softness and grace of the south; and Basil Byrne, watching him, decided that he would be dangerous, even deadly, if roused. There was a sullen fire in his dark eyes when he found other men attracting Pauline's attentions, which seemed as if it could easily flash out into flame.

only four; and the countess, anxious that the lovers should be able to converse in some foreign tongue without any embarrassment, sent with them only two children who were to be taken to the ball—Miss Conny Ferrers and her brother, a year older than herself.

Away rolled the carriage. The little people chattered together. Lafonte and Pauline spoke rapidly in Italian.

"Pauline, you have my heart," said the young secretary. "Last night I dreamed that I discovered that you were playing with it." "Do you not know," said Pauline, "that dreams go by the rule of contrary? They have a proverb to that effect in all languages."

"I know that my dream was fearfully realistic," said Lafonte. "More than that there is a fatal gift in our family—it—is that when we dream, as I dreamt last night, it is nearly certain that the dream will be realized." will be realized."
Pauline laughed an uneasy laugh.
"Pray, what did you dream?" she ask-

"I dreamt that there was a man whom you loved, and that man was not myself. I dreamed that I was in a room hiding behind a curtain, and I heard you tell a man that you loved him, and he said 'Let us wed tomorrow.' I thought that I had no knife in my hand, or that if I had had one I should have thrust

"We need not wait!" said Lafonte. "We can live—you still have rich gifts from your father—I have three hundred a year!"

"Paul, would I marry you and go about in this woman's train as pur wife? No, I have too much pride! Gifts from my father? That is true, but you know how that money is gained—you know that an atmosphere of ruin, despair and death, surrounds my so-called home—it is the fatal atmosphere of Monte Carlo—you know that, and you would hurry me into know that, and you would hurry me into marriage before our future is secure! Ah! Paul, your love for me is not true and patient as mine is for you. Women learn to wait and to weep, and to sacrifice self!"

Pauline began to weep. She had con-quered for the time; Paul lifted her gloved hands and kissed them fervently.

SNAKE CHARMING

Is not a popular occupation. Most women shrink from the sight of a snake and would faint at the touch of one. But these same women run greater risks than the snake charmer. How many women allow disease to fasten on them and slowly to crush out their strength. Womanly diseases should never be allowed to undermine the health. Female weakness, bearingdown pains, inflammation, ulceration, backache, headache, nervousness, and other womanly ailments, curable by Important Action Taken by Episcopalian Bishops.

The Vote on the Much Discussed Measure Was 37 to 21-Proposal to Change Name of Church.

San Francisco, Oct. 11.-The action of greatest importance taken on Wedof greatest importance taken on wednesday by the triennial Episcopal convention was the adoption by the house of bishops by a vote of 37 to 21, of canon 36, which relates to the solemnicanon 36, which relates to the solumnization of marriage. All of its provisions had previously been argued, except those contained in section 4, which forbade the marriage of persons divorced for any cause not existing before marriage. "For any cause not existing before marriage" is understood to refer to such causes as insanity, inability to execute a contract, the existence of a living wife or husband, or like reasons which practically render the marriage null and void. This section has been a bone of contention, a strong element in the church holding that the remarriage of innocent party to a divorce, granted on the ground of infidelity, should not be forbidden. The bishops have refused to accept this view of the matter.
