We lost that his unfortunate business will not end as peaceably as we would wish. The forty-two prisoners that were released were in all probability given up on the peremptory demand which was made by the late administration, and the release of the others, probably, as peremptority refused. If our demand for the whole of those prisoners has been refused, as there is every reason to believe, our relations with that Island or with the Government of Spain, cannot possibly remain unchanged. There may be, indeed, enough against the ten retained to put them upon a trial, according to Spanish law; but our government cannot look on and see the liberty or ives of our citizens not in je parely by a trial under laws to which they are strangers, conducted according to Spanish forms.

We are, therefore, not yet clear of the difficulties. Force, be printed;—Yeas 18, Nays 17.
