Rev. Mr. Pyley preached a very impressive sermon on Sunday morning, his text being found in Proverbs 11:24. In the evening, Rev. Mr. Bowers delivered a very fine discourse, his remarks being based on the words found in 1 Tim. 1:18, "war the good warfare."

HARRISBURG

Mr. Norval Durham having bought a farm near Princeton will move there in a short time. The many friends of Clarence Rouse, son of Mr. and Mrs. H. Rouse, formerly of this place, but now of Brantford, will be pleased to know that he is slowly recovering from a severe illness.

His Health in a Terrible State

By A. Conan Doyle Copyright, 1905, 1906, by A. Conan Doyle.

"Hasten to the warden, archer, and tell him how it befell. You will have the castle and the town in arms. I know not what the King may think of so sudden a demand, and you, Nigel, how in the name of the saints came you to play the child like this?"

"Fruit-a-tives" Healed His Kidneys and Cured Him

HAGERVILLE, ONT., AUG. 26th, 1913. "About two years ago, I found my health in a very bad state. My kidneys were not doing their work and I was all run down in condition. I felt the need of some good remedy, and having seen 'Fruit-a-tives' advertised, I decided to try them. Their effect, I found more than satisfactory."

BURFORD

It is expected that Hydro power for Burford will be pushed right along. The poles and electric fixtures are already at the station. Land for the erection of the station has been purchased from Harry Miller.

ances to Canada, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand. These are without interest so long as titles continue. When the European nations took arms against Napoleon, England sided the same policy. She financed entry after country until the men of a one-nation tyranny was banded. There is no doubt that Great Britain is in a healthy financial condition and better able to stand the strain of a long war than other Power. And her financiers phesy that when peace comes she will be in even better condition than in the struggle began.

DOING HER FULL SHARE. Vestminster Gazette.—We submit that the present is not the occasion of those moods of self-depression, which are a peace-time luxury of the British people. Our young men not failing us, we are not in doubt of the seriousness of these struggles, the paramount necessity of pursuing them to the end. In military assistance to our Allies we have already done twice as much as was expected of us, or as we thought of doing three months ago, and this is only a beginning. We are also rendering powerful assistance to the common cause by doing our industry going nearly at normal pressure, and producing goods urgently needed for our army and their armies.

Never had Nigel in his simple life at Tilford pictured a scene of such pomp and wondrous luxury. The grim faces were covered by the ceiling to floor with priceless tapestry of Arras, where hart, hounds and huntsmen circled the great hall with one long living image of the chase. Over the princely table rooped a line of banners, and beneath them rows of emblazoned shields upon the wall carried the arms of the high noblemen who sat beneath. The red light of the crescents and torques burned upon the badges of the great captains of England. The lions and lilies shone over the high dorseter chair in the centre, and the same august device marked with each cadence, the indicated the seat of the Prince, while glowing to right and to left were the long lines of noble insignia, honored in peace and terrible in war. There shone the red and gold of Manny, the engrailed cross of Suffolk, the red chevron of Stafford, the scarlet and gold of Audley, the blue lion rampant of the Percies, the silver swallows of the Arundels, the red roobee of the Montagues, the star of the de Veres, the silver scallops of Russell, the purple lion of de Lacy, and the black crosses of Clinton.

"I have heard of him as a man of great valor," said Nigel, gazing at him with interest. "Indeed, you may well say so, Master Loring. He is the bravest knight in England, and in Christendom also, I believe. No man hath done such deeds of valor."

Nigel looked at his new acquaintance with hope in his eyes. "You speak as if it becomes me to speak when you uphold your own master," said he. "For the same reason, Master Delves, and in no spirit of flattery, I will tell you that he is not to be compared in name or fame with the noble knight on whom I wait. Should you hold otherwise, then surely we can debate the matter in whatever way or time may please you best."

Delves smiled good-humoredly. "Nay, be not so hot," said he. "Had you upheld any other knight, save perhaps Sir Walter Manny, I had called you at your word, and your master on my mine would have had place for a new Squire. But indeed it is only trash that no knight is second to Chandos, nor would I draw my sword to lower his pride of place. Ha!

Of a sudden the King said something over his shoulder to Sir William de Pakyngham, the herald, who advanced and stood by the royal chair. He was a tall and noble-featured man, with long grizzled beard which rippled down to the gold-linked belt. His hand he placed the heraldic barret-cap which bespoke his dignity, and he slowly raised his white wand high in the air, while a great hush fell upon the hall.

"Merry men of England," said he, "knight banners, knights, squires, and all others here present of gentle birth and coat-of-armor, know that your dread and sovereign lord, Edward, King of England and of France, bids me give you greeting and commands you to come hither, that he may have speech with you."

In an instant the tables were deserted, and the whole company had clustered in front of the King's chair. Those who had sat on either side of him crowded inward so that his tall dark figure appeared itself amid the dense circle of his guests.
