"What advantage have we no through our policy that we should lose if we adopted the policy we have sketched. Simply this that no German ports would be closed to everything. Germany could still trade with the outside world through neutral ports in articles, which not being of use in war, would not be on our list of contraband. We do not think that that would be a serious or even an appreciable loss. On the other hand the gain of getting rid of this con-troversary with the United States might be very fruitful. It would remove the screen, which we are plac-ing between Germany and the full American indignation over the inhuman outrage on international law. It would keep up so far as it can be kept up with justice to ourselves the distinction between the civilian and belligerent use of articles of commerce. Lastly and most important it might lay the foundation of closer hip with America, which what-
