CHAPTER XI. AN AVOIDAL OF LOVE.

"I have loved you," he said, softly, "since the night of the ball. My whole heart went out to you—a heart which no woman had yet touched—nor will touch, if you refuse my love, Olive. I am no boy with his first passion, but a man with years enough to recognize the strength of my love for you."

Olive looked at him almost imploringly.

"Ah, do not look at me like that!" he cried. "See? I will not ask you for your love—it is too early—our acquaintance too brief. Give me but the hope to win you! Say that there is some hope for me! Don't send me away without hope, Olive, I implore you. I lay my whole life—my future—in your dear hands. Give me but the chance to win your love, and I will make your happiness my one object. Am I too presumptuous?"

There was silence, for Olive was absolutely unable to speak. She knew and recognized the power and latent nobility of the man; she knew, too, how happy her father would be at her choice, but—and there was the crux—she did not love him. Even with her limited experience, she knew that her faint liking and esteem were not born of the divine passion; and as she sat there, the tanned, grave face of Reuben Wynter rose before her eyes. No, she did not love Lord Cravenden—or, indeed, anybody.

Lord Cravenden, who had been watching every shade of the fair face, bent nearer to her.

"Olive," he pleaded, "you will not send me away? Let me try to win you—I ask no more. If at the end of six months, you say it cannot be, I will go away and trouble you no more."

He stopped, breathless, his hand outstretched in his eagerness, while Olive, pale and trembling, rose to her feet. As she did so, Lord Cravenden almost uttered an exclamation, for he descried Sir Edwin approaching the glade.

"Ah, here is Sir Edwin," he cried, as that gentleman came around the group of trees.

With a cry of joy Olive flew to her father's side; and Lord Cravenden felt, with a pang, that he had misused his opportunity, and perhaps failed in his suit. The three walked together to the Hall gates, where Lord Cravenden, declining to stay to lunch, bade father and daughter farewell.

After he had gone, Olive clung speechless to her father, as if for protection. He looked down on her fondly.

"Why, Olive, my dear, you look almost ill; what's wrong?"

"Nothing, father, dear," she said, almost tremulously, "I am tired, I think. That is all."

"You want a change, my darling," said Sir Edwin, as they entered the house. "What do you say to coming up to London?" Olive started. "Oh, yes!—yes, dear! I should like it better than anything. Let us go soon—anywhere from here—at once."

"Why, my dear, surely you have not taken a dislike to Bingleigh?" asked her father, anxiously.

"No, no—not to Bingleigh—not to anyone—but I shall be glad to get away—let us go away soon!"

To the astonishment and distress of her father she covered her face with her hands and burst into tears.

The delicate nerves had been strained to their utmost, and now came the period of reaction.

CHAPTER XII. A CHANGE OF FORTUNE.

IT was the morning of the Seymour's departure for London, and all was bustle and excitement at the Hall. Sir Edwin himself had been busy issuing instructions here and there, till at last he made his way to the stable yard.

"Is Mr. Wynter here?" he asked of one of the men; and as the man replied, the others exchanged significant glances. This was the first time Sir Edwin had prefixed "Mr." to Reuben's name.

Reuben was busy in the harness room, making a final examination of the things which were to go to town, and his master stood a moment in the doorway watching him, as he stood, absorbed in his work and oblivious to everything outside.

"Reuben," he said at last, "I want you a minute or two. Come with me, will you?"

He led the way to the library, where he bade Reuben close the door behind him; then he motioned him to be seated, the young man wondering whether he had done anything amiss.

"Reuben," said Sir Edwin, "I asked you here to have a few words with you before I go. First of all, are you happy?"

Reuben's face, as it lit up, was sufficient answer.

"You have no wish to leave Bingleigh?"

"No, indeed, Sir Edwin," was the earnest reply.

"I am glad of it," said Sir Edwin heartily. "In that case, I want to tell you how satisfied I am with the work you have done already, and I want to add fresh responsibilities to those you already have, if you will undertake them."

Reuben glanced up gratefully.

"You are young," continued the older gentleman, smiling; "but, I think, quite capable of acting as my steward."

"Steward!" echoed the young man, half rising from his chair and turning pale.

"Yes," said his master, "will you be steward of Bingleigh Hall?"

Reuben was speechless with emotion, and he grasped the arm of his chair with spasmodic force.

"If you think you are too young to have such a post thrust upon you, you must say so," said Sir Edwin kindly.

"It is not that, sir," said Reuben huskily, "it is your trust in me that gets over me; you don't know where I come from, or who I am, any more than I do myself, for that matter," he added, sadly.

"Nonsense, man," said Sir Edwin, "you have won my respect, and I trust you. Try the work while I am away, and then, if it is too much for you, you can resign when I return."

"I can never repay you for all your kindness to me, Sir Edwin, but I will do my best."

"Good!" said Sir Edwin, encouragingly; then, unlocking a drawer of his desk, he took out account books, keys, and a bag of money, and pushed them over to Reuben.

"There you are, steward," he said lightly, for he saw how moved the young man was at his new position.

"Take up your burden, and glad I am to leave you in charge."

opened up for you, and your grandfather, when he returns. If I were you, I should have the caravan placed at the back, and turn the old horse into the paddock."

"I will do just what you wish," said Reuben.

"No, no, my dear fellow. I want you to do just as you think fit," said Sir Edwin, then he led the way out of the room.

As he had expected, the men and servants were all assembled, and there was a sudden hush as their master appeared on the steps, with Reuben Wynter by his side.

"Men," began Sir Edwin, "you all know the man at my side, and I think you all like and esteem him: am I right?"

There were murmurs of assent.

"He has worked with you for some months, and has never shirked his duty or made himself overbearing."

Sir Edwin went on, "and I am sure you will take what I am going to do and say in good part, and feel with me that the step is a wise one for the estate, for me, and for all of us. Men, Mr. Wynter is steward of Bingleigh."

There were murmurs of astonishment, and then there came a hearty "Aye!"

"During my absence he is going to give the place a trial, and I know he will do his best, and that you will help him. I believe I have chosen well, and I hope you think so."

With a cheery nod Sir Edwin walked away, a hearty cheer followed him, the crowd immediately surrounded Reuben, pouring out congratulations and expressions of good will; then they separated and went about their work.

Reuben stood with throbbing heart and whirling brain; it was all too wonderful for him to grasp it at once. He felt that he must get to work at something, or he should lose his head.

Try Making Your Own Cough Remedy

You can save about $2, and have a better remedy than the ready-made kind. Easily done. If you combined the curative properties of every known "ready-made" cough remedy, you would hardly have in them all the curative power that lies in this simple "home-made" cough syrup which takes only a few minutes to prepare.

Get from any druggist 2 1/2 ounces of Pinex (50 cents worth), pour it into a 16-oz. bottle and fill the bottle with plain granulated sugar syrup. The total cost is about 55 cents and gives you 16 ounces of really better cough syrup than you could buy ready-made for $2.50. Taste pleasant and acts rapidly.

This Pinex and sugar syrup preparation gets right at the cause of a cough and gives almost immediate relief. It loosens the phlegm, stops the throat, soothes the chest and breaks the irritating membranes that line the throat, chest and bronchial tubes, so that the ordinary cough and cold, bronchitis, croup, whooping cough and bronchial asthma, it is really astonishing. A day's use will usually overcome the ordinary cough and cold.

Pinex is a most valuable concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract and has been used for generations to break up severe coughs. To avoid disappointment, ask your druggist for 2 1/2 ounces of Pinex with full directions, and don't accept anything else. A guarantee of absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded, if you are not satisfied. The Pinex Co., Toronto, Ont.
