—OR—
Love and Honour.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER XI.

"When he dismissed her?" repeated

Jaquin, inquiringly.

"Aye, you must know she was English governess in the Herr's house, and the moment the wine merchant came to know that she and his son were betrotted, he tried to persuade her to give him up, and go away out of his sight.

I was on the landing and heard most of the conversation, and she stuck firm to her point, in spite of all that he could say. When he spoke of low station and poverty, she met him with her high notions of love, and mutual affection being above wealth and rank. A low birth, she said, was no disparagement where the partyage was honest and honorable. Loudly she declared that if through her family she brought disgrace to Herman or his friends, she would never marry him; but—

"Had she said that?" exclaimed

Jaquin, with sudden and startling energy.

"She did, but immediately added, with an air as proud as an empress, that her parents and connections were as pure in character and spotless in fame as any family, however exalted. There she took her stand, and left the house as firm as adamant.—Why, what's the matter with you?"

"Would she abide by that test?" cried

Jaquin, who had become extraordinarily excited. "Bah," he went on, "I am a fool to ask it. She felt it convenient to say what she did, because she fully believed she was safe on that score. A discovery to the contrary would not alter her anything, I daresay. She would find a way of getting over it.

"Getting over what?" inquired Dubosque. "What are you driving at?"

"I mean, suppose it was to come out that some member of her family—a near
