The Foster Brother:

The Orphan of the Wreck. CHAPTER VIII.

THE CONSTRENATION OF STEPHEN AND MALACTHE CONSTRENATION OF STEPHEN AND MALACOLM.

Another bleak Feburary day — bleak everywhere, even in the valley of Glenfask, ever which the winter had swept since first we described it, and turned it into bareness and barrenness. That is in outward appearance, for we all know that the desolation of winter is but the prelude to; and necessary preparation for, the renewing beauty of spring and nature's annual fullness of life. Chilly and miserable, dark and gloomy, as was this Feburary day, lowering over the hills, and lying on the great and fertile strath; in a few weeks the buds and blossoms would burst forth; the landscape would brighten into greenest verdure; the bright sunshine would return; the music of rill and stream and grove would break forth with gladsome sound, and all the glories of summer would be renewed.

Still it was February now, and bleak and bitter enough. A cold cutting east wind came direct from the see, and the masses of heavy clouds rolling slowly overhead sont forth a mixture of rain and half frozen snow, making the air colder far than if a clear keen frost had power over it.

It was a day in when no one went out of and gaze forth on the woods and heids but dimly seen, through the flying showers.

And this was precisely the luxury which was being enjoyed by Stephen and Malcolm Gibson in the dining-room at Ardgowan, where they had been all through the winter.

Stephen was of course master there now, and settled himself down as proprietor of the estaste. A month had not elapsed from the night of wreck and the death of George when he brought his wife and child from the garrison town in England where they were residing, and introduced them to their new and exalted position. Afrs. Gibson was a quiet delicate woman—very different in nature and disposition from her husband, whose greatest pleasure was in the society of her one child—her boy Harry—then not quite two years of age, and a fine engaging little fellow, who promised to inherit his mother's qualities of heart and disposition. She welcomed Stephen's accession to Ardgowan chiefly because if drew her away from the moengenial atmosphere of garrison and military life, the society and fastness of which she was neither strong enough for not could appreciate. The difference in all things between Stephen Gibson and his wife was so great that we might well ask why they should ever have become man and wife, but ill-assorted marriages are too common to afford matter for surprise, and we must assorted marriages are too common to af-ford matter for surprise, and we must assorted marriages are too common to afford matter for surprise, and we must just be content to chronical the fact, without seeking to account for it.

A favourite room in the west wing of the mansion was where Mrs. Gibson and Harry were generally to be found together, and there they were on this cold february afternoon, while Stephen and Malcolm sat together in the diviger room.

Stephen was no longer in the army—he had sold out, for why should a great landed proprietor; undergo the drudgery and bondage of "active service?" Malcolm wished to sell out, too, and go to Jamaica to manage the plantation which George had left, and see to the right administration of the affairs connected with it. Stephen was beginning to think this would be a judicious step to take, for Nathan Garret, who had been George's manager, had never replied to the letter which had been duly sent him announcing the wreck of the Eglantine, and the change of masters which that event had brought about. Ample time had now elapsed for a letter to have come from him, giving a full report of the property, its size, its value, and all its belongings. But such letter had not cope, and the brothers were beginning to be afraid lest Garret might intend to play them false. He had ample means of doing so, for, of course, no one in Scotland knew what property and possessions George had in Jamaica, so that if the manager was inclined to Play the regue he had a singular opportunity of doing so; and that he meant it, was a supicior which his silence had caused to grow in the minds both of Stephen and Malcolm.

As they sat emprossed in the discussion of this important matter, the sound of wheels was heard in the avenue and
