bread. The utmost bread he takes at a meal is a thin biscuit of wheaten flour. When he takes meat he eats nothing eise. Wine is eschewed. As he rises in the morning he sucks an orange or eats a small bunch of grapes. Roast apples, with a tiny pinch of bicarbonate or soda to correct the acidity, and milk similarly treated, are important items of his cietray. He takes no drink with his food, and this obliges him to masticate well. To John Wesley's rules of health he added those of the great French physiologist Flourens, who believed one hundred and twenty to be the normal period of human life.
