

TRAINING THE FUTURE MONARCH

How English Royal Princes Are Brought Up.

VERY MUCH LIKE OTHER BOYS

Don't Like Arithmetic, Preferring to Hang Out of the Palace Windows.

London, May 16. — Moving day has meant much to the two prospective kings of England—the Prince of Wales and his eldest son, aged 8. They have been gradually getting across from dingy, stuffy old St. James Palace to big, up-to-date Marlborough House, and are now well-nigh settled in the huge brick mansion in which the Prince of Wales was born, and which during the present King's long occupancy of it, was the greatest house in London, from a smart social standpoint.

If you belonged to the "Marlborough House" set you could take delight in the thought that your follies were considered worthy of admittance from famous preachers; that your frivolities were of enough importance to be sniffed at by dignified dowagers of the older aristocracy; and that your smartness was the envy of the socially ambitious, who hoped some day to get an invitation to the jolly dinner parties that used to be given at Marlborough House when the present King was Prince of Wales.

The famous mansion will be rather more domestic now for while, for the Princess of Wales rules with a strong hand, and her five young children will be running over the place. The change of residence is of especial importance to the fair-haired, blue-eyed, well-built little boy who, in the ordinary course of events, will be King Edward VIII. some day. He will have to wait on him and more attentions to remind him of his own significance.

HATES 'RITHMETIC. The prince was so great a favorite with Queen Victoria that she insisted upon teaching him the alphabet and supervising his studies generally so long as he lived, except arithmetic, which he abominated, and for neglected which he has frequently been made of in a corner. A few days ago, according to my informant, the prince revolted when he saw the hated states coming on and said: "I don't think I'll go in the corner instead, if you don't mind."

Apparently it has been decided that the old schoolroom in that part of St. James Palace called York House, shall be retained for daily school use, for the little princes are still to be seen there, and many are the entertaining glimpses of them given to me at first hand by the friend who supplies much of this information.

One frosty morning last autumn Prince David (his name is Edward Albert Christian George Andrew Patrick David, and he is more often called David than Edward by his family) and his young brother Albert had been left alone for a moment. Happily they love a band came tooting along. They love processions better than anything in the world. It didn't take them but a minute to knock things helter-skelter on the big scholastic desk, and out of the window, to toss all thoughts of lessons higher than a kite and flatten their royal noses up against the window pane. But, alas! the tutor came back. The defaulting young students were frightened but firm. They determined to stick by their guns as long as possible. They didn't move. Some people across the street, who had seen Mr. Hansell, the tutor, step briskly to the window and lay hold on the younger prince of England by the collar. Little Albert sought support from his brother. He grabbed Prince Eddie about the waist. Prince Eddie grabbed the curtain. But the tutor came off victorious and the curtain came down. In the end, however, Prince Edward went out, for the tutor told the Prince of Wales, and a window seat was put in next day.

ROYAL SCHOOL HOURS. The King's grandchildren are being brought up under a curious mixture of clemency and severity. Their tutor, Mr. Hansell, an Oxford man, who formerly taught Prince Arthur of Connaught and the present Duke of Marlborough, has absolute authority over his royal pupils. He travels with them, usually, as his authority is not strictly limited to school hours. He makes them study two hours a day to the minute, outside the time he and the assistant tutors are hearing lessons. The princes enjoy several things about St. James Palace that the tutors are not partial to. If the Prince of Wales and his uncle, the Duke of Connaught, who lives at Clarence House, adjoining St. James, were not so abnormally good-natured, they would have rebelled long ago against the stream of typists, shop assistants, clerks of one kind or another, day laborers, and so forth, who make the palace courtyard a morning and evening thoroughfare. These people save about a good block by cutting through the palace grounds to the Victoria station and under palace archways into Pall Mall leading to the uptown business streets. For years the royal family have endured these early morning noises just because they were too good-natured to inconvenience the working people. The Duke of Connaught is said to have admitted once, laughingly, that he'd like to sleep longer in the morning, but that he'd rather wake up than sleep at the expense of his fellow-countrymen, who have to work hard at best.

IN CLOSE TOUCH WITH LIFE.

The noises which make the Duke and the prince lose their morning nap are matters of intense excitement to the younger generation. Many of the trade-people have learned to look up at the window and wait for a bow and smile. The nodding back and forth is very informal, no courtesying or special deference to royalty. The children are, however, wonderfully particular in their own manners. Even the third little prince, when taken out in his perambulator, salutes the colors at the changing of the guard and apes his brothers in their unfailing politeness to everybody they meet.

The other very particular pleasure the Pall Mall window affords the children is the near view of people arriving at and departing from the palace. Their parents as well as Queen Alexandra and the King always glance up toward the palace tower to wave their good-byes.

The future King Edward VIII. is evidently going to be a crack horseman, as befits the great-grandson of the aged King Christian of Denmark, who was in his day one of the best horsemen in Europe, and who even yet rides in a fashion that the Prince of Wales might envy. Both Princes Edward and Albert, and even little Prince Henry, have already had much experience on ponies, and last week they began more ambitious lessons in the riding school of Buckingham Palace. They are bright, active, healthy little fellows, who like this part of their schooling far better than their books.

Although "David" is yet such a small boy, unofficial royal matchmakers have already picked out a bride for him—his second cousin Olga, the eldest daughter of the Czar of Russia.

TORONTO HAS TROUBLES

Street Railway Company and Men at Loggerheads.

Toronto, May 18. — Employees of the street railway union and non-union, held a meeting Saturday night to discuss the result of the negotiations which have been carried on for some time by a committee of the men and officials of the company. A statement was given out by the men giving a history of the dealings. The men asked for some minor favors, such as a partition and a stool for the motor-men, but the main points were recognition of the grievance committee of the union, and an increase of the wage scale from 20 to 24 cents an hour. This latter the company has definitely refused, and although at first dissenting to recognize the grievance committee, later offered to do so on certain conditions. These conditions were rejected by the men meeting on Saturday. The committee were instructed to offer other terms and the negotiations will be renewed. Meantime it is said that a representative of the Thief Detective Agency of St. Louis is here in the interests of the company.

Pay my funeral expenses, and all my bank accounts to be forwarded to this Mrs. Peter Jordan, as quickly as possible, as I am not to live many days. S.—Please make no mistake, and I wish the directors of the Rochester banks to have this notice forwarded to the Buffalo banks, as I have a large amount of money there also."

A GREAT PANIC COMING

An Economic Expert Predicts One Within Five Years.

Chicago, May 18. — Dr. Herbert J. Davenport, of the economics department of the University of Chicago, in his class in economic history, made the statement that within five years the United States would see another panic.

"I feel safe," he said in guaranteeing a panic in the United States within five years.

He bases his statement on the fact that wages are rising, causing a lessening of profits, which in its turn causes a slump in stocks, and on the fact that in the last century panics have occurred periodically, one every ten years on an average. He said:

"In times of rising prices wages rise as a result of high prices and therefore not with the early, but less rapidly than prices. It is largely for this reason that profits range so high during flush times and that stock values, which are based on profits, show marked expansion. The strike activity is the attempt of labor to force up wages to correspond with prices. Its success must mean a tendency toward lower value in stocks."

"Panics have been occurring at intervals of about ten years during the nineteenth century. It is to allow ourselves to be misled by our hopes to suppose that no more panics are to come. In recent years they have visited this country in 1857, 1886, 1873, 1884 and 1893. We are due for another now. The squeeze of last fall in the stock market may postpone for a year or two the time that a panic might have otherwise occurred. This movement, if successful, will have a bearing to lower profits and to squeeze some water out of stock valuations."
