Undeniably the conception of beauty changes with the times, almost with the fashion. At this period

Neither would she be able to hunt, play golf, tennis, hockey, baseball, nor could she jazz or fox-trot. We could not even invite Venus to that sort of entertainment. She had better stick to her pedestal, whence she can pityingly look down upon our de-generation, feeling that she and the Rubens lady are eternal, and wondering what artist will arise and glorify our type for the joy and admiration of generations to come.

I confess that I find it almost quite impossible to separate beauty from charm. Somehow beauty without charm seems a small thing, or rather to lose three-quarters of its value, to become lifeless.

Beauty is a gift of the gods and must be treated as such, not marred by pose or affectation. It must be carried lightly, a joy to the possessor as to the world at large. Or then give me a thousand times rather the plain girl with snub nose, freckles and a too-large mouth. A big, honest mouth that can laugh gloriously is a thousand times more attractive than a simpering mouth, too beautiful even

Youth Can Be Prolonged. Undoubtedly the woman who wants to be beautiful and use every atom of charm she has, can achieve wonders. The French are past masstanding comedy, pleasing in its originality and entertaining in its presentation. A Pathe news reel and ters of this art. There are few really beautiful Frenchwomen, but they know how to dress as no one else in the world just as the Frenchwoman has a way of saying possibly, impossible things. Paris is, of course, the place to go be beautified, and I believe London and New York are now following close upon her heels. charming, to please. All women want to please. She would not be a real woman if she did not. Can I give any advice and rules to go by? A difficult question! But I do think there are one or two good principles which can serve all the world over: I am positively sure that the af-fected, self-conscious, pretentious woman is the one who has least charm. What, then, does charm rebier (Moore) is a successful lawyer who has reached the dizzy heights of fame and fortune by defending charming ladies in their separation side in, health? Enthusiasm? Secret of True Charm.

It is hard to say. It can depend upon the tiniest little trick of nature—the line of an eyebrow, the tone of a voice, in a certain way of laughing, of throwing back the head, of being eager, attentive, of coming into a room. Charm is so subtle a thing, so immaterial, yet it is taking, penetrating, it can hold you fast and never let you go again.

The statuesque, languid, supercilious, disdainful woman has seldom the Groom. The act closes with an Eskimo setting and another Murphy song that went over well.

M. Gintaro, a little Jap, had a sion, but charm is something else her. She can fascinate, inspire pas-not think of herself, the one whose in-terest in others is greater than her self-absorption, the one who in spite of herself fascinates because without knowing it she is all the time giving giving of her best self. Charm is not solely the possession of youth. The old woman can have it as well as the young one, the plain one as well as the beauty. There is often greater charm to be found in a face upon which life has written its story than in a quite young face, un-lined, unmarked by the hand of time. There is a fascination about eyes that have seen much and still remained kindly, in a smile that has sadness beneath its outward brave galety. Painters love these faces and have made of them their greatest pictures. (Copyright, 1925, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved).
