dancing season, Paris being in all things a month earlier than London; and after Cin derellas, fancy balls and costume reunions, in which inventive eccentricity was to be confined entirely to (the outsides of) the heads of the guests, it seemed that nothing new in that line could be devised. Someing to the extracts by Bliss, Vol. II., page thing new has been devised, and is now in the full swing of Parisian patronage and popularity. Dances are given in which the hostess assumes a nationality. The Parisienne is content for the night to be a Spaniard, a Pole, a Neapolitan, and as is the hostess as must be her guests. The mise en scene is rigorously correct. In one salon you might fancy yourself in Madrid, especially if you had ever been there. You have the sarabande and the bolero, the short peticotast, the gay flounces; and, where nature (or art) can supply them, the olive complexions, the flustrous locks, and the rather wanton eyes of the country of bull-fights dark beauties are much admired and Spanish lace is in high request. A few doors off you are in Poland, Chopin's Areamy waltzes giving the music and the slow, swinging step so inexplicable to a Frence, man accustomed to tectotum gyrations. German manners and customs are notyet very opular; but there seems a creize for the. Russian mode. On the whole, the boulevardier boasts with reason that after it has struck 12 he can make a four of the world in forty minutes.

The North German Gazette replies to the "attacks of the Spanish republican Castelar on the elevated person of the German emperor" by as hearty an attack on the character of his assailant, ascribing his rancor to the fact that Germany was one of the first powers to recognize Alfonso RII. after the fall of the republic, and his motive to a desire to fish with selfish ends in the troubled waters of a new republic.
