JAMMED ON A BRIDGE.

Cattle Stampede and Find Trouble-Quick Work in Rescue.

[Topeka State Journal.] One hundred head of cattle frightend and in a stampede rushed toward the Rock Island Railway bridge on Monday. In less time than it takes to tell it, 50 of the animals were helpless on the bridge, with their legs dangling under the ties. A half dozen were crowded off and fell into the water, fifteen feet below. The cattle belonged to the Union Stock Yards of North Topeka. The proprietors, Dary & Crow, had sold they were driven out of the yards to Island freight depot.

Men were lined up on either side of the animals, and the forward ones of chute that led into the cars by men with long, sharp spikes in their hands. As the herd became more compact by those from behind being forced against the leaders some of the sides refused to go farther. They turned and started south toward the bridge. Two boys on horses tried to turn them back, but failed, and in a moment the whole herd was rushing directly toward ry little suffering. Baby is seven weeks the bridge. Several men made an ineffectual attempt to stop the frightened animals, who paid no attention whatever to their shouts. The first of the animals to get onto the bridge was a large red steer. He went from tie to tie until he was half across the first span, when down he went and hung helpless between the imbers. One that followed him went through before he had gone ten feet on the bridge, and he was helpless indeed, for one of his front legs and one of his hind ones were broken by the fall. As the cattle crowded each other on the dangerous bridge a large spotted steer was forced off. Down he went head first and struck the water with a where he fell, and he disappeared under the water, but when he came up he struck for the bank, and soon landed unharmed.

By this time the bridge was almost covered with cattle. A few reached the end of the second span, but then they fell through. One which was near the end of the second span got tired of the perilous footing and jumped into the river. About midway of the span a heifer fell through. She struggled to free herself and in thrashing around broke two of her legs. But in her struggles she managed to free herself and dropped into the water. With her legs broken the poor animal could not swim, and was carried down the river by the current for two blocks and was then hauled out by ropes. hauled out by ropes.

It was a startling sight. The north span of the bridge was covered with a Arlington span of the bridge was covered with a squirming, helpless mass of cattle. The rest of the herd which came up did not attempt to cross the bridge, for there was no longer any room.

In five minutes' time 50 cattle were fastened on the bridge, besides the halfdozen that had jumped or fallen into the water.
