The Story of the Diamond

Chapter 15.—How They Are Cut.

Before the diamond is polished it must be suitably trimmed, and great skill and judgment are called for that the very best results may be obtained.

Within recent years, a very few diamond cutters have introduced a process of "sawing" their diamonds, before polishing, incredible as this may appear.

Picture to yourself a little circular "saw," about 2 inches in diameter, without any teeth, made of a sort of bronze no thicker than writing paper, fastened between two steel washers, about 1 1/2 inch wide, to keep it from bending or "buckling," and revolving at a very rapid rate, whilst a paste of diamond dust and thick oil is applied—that's all, and yet it saws the diamond, very, very slowly, of course, notwithstanding the fact that it is the hardest known substance in nature.

With the great majority of cutters, however, the process of "cleaving" is the one followed. There is a line of cleavage in every rough diamond which must be followed just as the "grain" in wood.

This line of cleavage discovered, the workman uses the sharp edge of one stone to make a slight cut or mark in the stone to be operated upon; a steel edge like the blade of a dull knife, is inserted, and with a smart knock or blow the cleavage follows.

We'll speak about the polishing to-morrow.
