Extravagance and production ran in the family. So with each new ever came new morrgager, and are after from went into other hands, until the present Squire found. Sinselt possessed on only the fines but dilapidated old Grange, of which halt rooms were shut up, and the bone farm surrounding it. On these there was also amorrgage, the Squire's one effort in that line when young and 'fast.' Also, three were about a thousand acres of moorland and hill, of beather, oroem, and bracken, but except in his being able to say that 'the moon' was his, it added nothing to Alfred Mellet's position. Rabbits, and in winter saipe and wild fowl, dwelt on it; otherwises it was not available tor producing anything Speculative building was unknown in that wild district, and 'plotted land's had been anything Speculative building was unknown in that wild district, and 'plotted land's had been been stored to be some one was too small to sford the sale and wild been to be supplied to be some one was too small to sford the sale and wild be the supplied wild wild wild be shown that it was chie iff his ancestors' and only to a small 'extent his own, fault) at house sortly needed repearing the gardens, and wild feel the long row of stalls; gone to be completed the coach-boases. to be one of vast importance and benefit to the Squire.

The doctor bad called one morning to see Mrs. Mellett, who was ailing. After interviewing his patient, he was chatting with the Squire in the neglected, weedgrown avenue when a vehicle entered it.

Mr. Mellett stared at the unusual sight he neither visited nor wished to be visited now. Then he muttered under his breath an eath.

an oath.

From the hired dog cart out sprang a lithe, well dressed, clean-shaved, dark-eyed man. 'How are you, Squire?' he said with much appearance of bonhomie. And the Squire, with constrained civility, replied perfunctorily, shaking hands, 'How are you, Mr. Beltley?'

'Just run down for a day or two to Riversleigh for change of air—stepping at the 'El phant'—wanted to see you on a little business!'

The squire winced. 'Yes?' he said. 'I'm'

'We City men know what we're about' and the Squire, to whom the fragrance appealed with memories of his 'Quite so.' grance appealed with memories of his youthful days, lit his cigar appreciatively. Then the two men paced up and down the

Mr. Mellett's face during the conversa-Mr. Mellett's face during the conversa-tion showed various emotions—annoyance, pride, and alarm in turn. Then it be-came calmer as Beltley concluded his re-marks. After this they went round to the stables and ordered the horse and gig to be got ready. And then Beltley with a jowal farewell drove away, leaving the Squire gazing moodily after him.

"What is it, dear?" said quiet, handsome Mrs. Mellett, whose gentle sweetness had never been altered. 'Tell me, Altred; I know you've had some unusual worry,' and she took his hand fondly.

'Well, I will, dear,' said the Squire wearily. 'Whom should I tell but you, who've been far too good a wife for a reckless. extravagant.....'

Well, Beltley has been here.

Mrs. Mellett grew pale. 'And about the mortgage?' she murmured. 'Yes; and he wants his money. Says he can make it pay much more per cent, hang

'And if he does not get it?' said Mrs.

'Then—he'll—foreclose,' said the Squire, trying to speak c lmly. 'And the dear old place, which for three hundred years has been—' and here, after a gulp and a groan, he broke down and fairly hid his face on his wile's sboulder.

Then was the woman a 'ministering angel' indeed. She soothed him fondly, and showed her own beart as the strenger, repressing her own desire to mingle her trans with his. By and-by he grew c lmer. But look at it as he would, he could not see how he was to get £2,000, in debt as he was in other quarters, wite a small income, every pound of which was needed, and at a time when land had mitch depreciated in value, while there were plenty of more paying investments. The home farm was of but average quality, the Grange a dilapidated place, though both were inexpressibly dear to their owner.

'I—I—' he said later to his sympathic wife, 'forgot to say that he binted—the usual thing in novels—that if Ethel—' and he paned.

Mrs. Mellett's eyes sparkled with unusual ire.

'He thought that Ethel would marry

sgitated.

'Surely, surely.' he would soliloquise,
'that company promoting, cash-lending cad won't be allowed to woo Ethel! And yet what chance has a hardworking country
'sawbones,' though he does save a little each year, sgainst such an income ?'
One day, however, his jealousy was specially aroused. Mrs. Mellett and her daughter and Beltley were strolling over the mcor, Wynnett riding some distance behind them at right angles. His angry glance saw the financier bow over E hel's hand—her moth r was a little distance off,
probably, as Wynnett said to himself,
purposely—and then sentimentally uproot
a piece of wild broom at her feet and place it between his cost next his heart.
'A pretty place fo, the symbol of the proud Plantagenet!' said the doctor savagely; 'and as for Ethel—well, I wouldn't have thought — But it's for her father, of course, poor grl!' and Wynnett rode away from the scene as rapidly as possible.
Now at dinner that evening at the Grange—the modest repast shared by Mr.
and Mrs. Mellett and their daughter—the meaning of that scene was explained far more satisfactorily, as Wynnett would have acknowledged could he have heard it.

'He behaved very well,' said Mrs. Mel-

it.

'He behaved very well,' said Mrs. Mellett; 'for when Ethel quietly told him she could not accept his offer he said that he should not wish to force any woman's inclination, and he should always remain on good taways rich are with a bitter smile, 'the Grarg's hospitality is, perforce, only a memory'

Here Wynnett, fielding himself in the way, shook hands with the Squire and rode off, atter a mementary glance at the newcomer, which the latter, did not observe. 'Good-looking chap, that,' he said, with a familiarity which the Squire thought very wulgar. 'Who is he?'

'He is the doctor of Riversleigh, a very clever voung man.' Who is he?'

'Ah!' said Mr. Beltley. The doctor; then he's out of our running,' jocularly, 'tor you're a county man. So much the better.'

'I don't understand you,' said the squire staring at him.

'No! Ah well, you will perhaps later on! Now lets bave a talk. I s'pose my fellow can put up his horse in your stables; they are big enough, ha! ha!'

Mellett; 'for when Ethel quietly told him she could not accept his offer he said that he bould not wish to force any woman's inclination, and he should always remain on good-terms with us.'

Agleam of hope irradiated the Squire's mind. 'Perhaps he will let me have extra time for getting the money,' he murmured. 'These men sometimes do genorous things.'

And, indeed, it seemed as it Melton Beltley were not the Shylock he was painted, but a whimsical compound. For next way he came to the Grange, cheery and smilling with none of the malevolence of the rejected mortgagee of fiction about him; and then gave the driven cff, Belt.' Ab a side of the squire staring at him.

'No! Ab well, you will perhaps later on! Now lets bave a talk. I s'pose my fellow can put up his horse in your stables; they are big enough, ha! ha! ha!

Mellet fl. shed a glance of scorn at him, and then gave the driven cff, Belt.

Now your noon's just the place to stock with rabelits' the said that he could not accept his offer he said that he could not accept his toffer he said that he could not accept his toffer he said that he could not accept his toffer he said that he could not accept his toffer he said that he could not accept his toffer he said that he could not accept his offer he said that he could n night. It's rabbit farming on a big scale. Now your moor's just the place to stock with rabcits'

'There's nothing else you could stock it with,' said the Squire, 'unless snipe and plover—it's worthless and dreary—or I suppose I should have raised money on it.'

'Quite so. Well, you can do it now.'

'Now P How? What do you mean?'

'Give me a conveyance of the moor for £2 000, and I'll hand you over your mortgage and you can put it in the fire.

'But the moor's worthless land—of course, if you mean it, and its your hobby—but it's very generous.'

So it was arranged, and Mr. Beltley returned to town.

When the doctor next called he was fold of this, at which he said little except 'Rabbits? Guinea-pigs' are more in his line, I should imagine.'

When Ethel (privately), however, told him of the proposal and her reply he was highly delighted. A day or two later he left for London also. In a few days he returned with a friend, a man of much activity and keenness of expression, who had been a former fellow student but had followed other patus than medicine.

On the day when Beltley was to arrive, Wynuett and his friend Wheeler paid an early visit to the Grange, and on the appearance of the former retired into the orawing-room, though Wynnett exchanged a glance of intelligence with Ethel, who quitted the room. Meanwhile in the Surre's study—or 'den,' as he called it—he and his visitor were seated.

Jovially smiling, the latter produced the Squire's title deeds and mortgage and a conveyance of the moor.

'Sign that.' he said, 'and here are your deeds, and the mortgage becomes extinct. We shall want a witness.'
'Shall I do?' said Wynett, entering—B'hel had kept him informed.
Up started Beltey savagely at the placid keen-eyed Wheeler, and white with rage. The doctor smiled, the Squire looked bewildered.

The doctor smiled, the Squire looked bewildered.
Don't sign that, sur,' said Wynett.
'This generous gentleman wants you to give him for £2.000. I and for which a company will give £20,000. I had the curiosity to get another piece of the wild broom I say Mr. B-tley gather. I've studied, among other things, metallurgy, and had my ideas. It was as I thought. The roots were loaded with ore. Lodes on ideas are beneath your moorland; Mr.
Wheeler the mining engineer, has examined it—and can get you,' with a glance at the deeds, 'any resonable amount of money in advance you may want.'

Mr. Wheeler signified assent. Betley, deteated withdraw.

The morpage has long since been cleared off, and Ethel was dowered with a good share of the wealth first guessed from a piece of wild broom.

When a song is sung so much that verybody dislikes it is called it popular.
