SEARCH AMERICA FOR BEAUTY SPOT

Scotch Couple, With $40,000-000, Looking for Place to Make New Home.

Edmonton, Alta., April 2.—Trying to find a place in which to establish a home worthy of a fortune of some $40,000,000 is the bothersome task that has kept Mr. and Mrs. John Campbell, of Scotland, on the move over since the war ended. They have been spending a few days in Edmonton. But this city offered no attractions for this $40,000,000 couple and they have left for Prince Rupert. Then they jump to California. The tale of the Campbells reads like fiction. Leaving their Scottish homes years ago, they went to Java. Here they acquired large plantations and other holdings. Then during the war opportunity came their way and they sold out all their interests in Java for a sum that was stated to be close to $50,000,000.

FRANCE DEPENDS ON AID OF ALLIES

The Bonds Between the Allies Must Be Strengthened Continually, Says Tardieu.

Brussels, April 2.—The salvation of France lies in maintaining her alliance with the Anglo-Saxon peoples—Great Britain and the United States—André Tardieu, former French Commissioner to the United States, declared in a lecture here yesterday on "France and her Allies."

Mr. Tardieu added that France and Belgium had common interests, which rendered a union between the two countries vitally necessary.

After dealing with the crisis confronting France and her Allies as a result of the extraordinary drain upon their resources caused by a war of five years, Mr. Tardieu pointed out that France had retrieved much of her losses by hard work. He gave figures to show that Germany, having renounced work, was in a position to pay the indemnities demanded.

"All our efforts must tend toward execution of the peace treaty," Mr. Tardieu continued. "Let us not forget that peace will be what we make it, and that the bonds between the Allies must be strengthened continually. It must not be supposed that the understanding will be maintained automatically. Our utmost endeavor must be exerted to assure the stability of their union."

True Knights of Faith

"In the chamber above you, May the saints be with us all!" Arose from the couch and left the chamber, while Alleyn could hear his feet but what danger could threaten them? Young Alleyn walked across to the door of famous warriors, with high window and gazed out at the moonlit landscape, his mind absorbed by the thought of the Lady Tiphany, and the strange words that she had spoken as to what was going forward at Castle Tynwynham. Learning his elbows upon the stone-work, he slowly let his thoughts be brought back to Villerehanche and to the scene before him.

The window at which he stood was in the second floor of that portion of the castle which was nearest to the keep. In front lay the broad moat, with the moon lying upon its surface, now clear and round, now drawn lengthwise as the breeze stirred the waters. Beyond, the plain sloped down to a thick wood, while further to the left a second wood shut out the view. Between the two an open glade stretched, silvered in the moon shine, with the river curving across the lower end of it.

As he gazed, he saw of a sudden a man stand forth from the wood into the open clearing. He walked with his head sunk, his shoulders curved, and his knees bent, as one who was hard to remain unseen. Ten paces from the fringe of trees he glanced around, and waving his hand he crouched down, and was lost to sight among a belt of furze-bushes. After him there came a second man, and after him a third, a fourth, and so on, until a whole army of men appeared and darting into the shelter of the brushwood. Nine-and-seventy Alleyn counted of these dark figures, and he counted the line of the moonlight across the line of the moonlight.

Many bore huge burdens upon their backs, though what it was that they carried he could not tell at the distance. Out of the one wood and into the other they passed, all with the same crouching, furtive gait, until the black bristles of trees had swallowed up the last of them.

For a moment Alleyn stood in the window, still staring down at the silent forest, uncertain as to what he should think of these midnight walkers. Then he bethought him that there was one beside him who was wiser than he in such a matter. His fingers had scarce rested upon Aylward's shoulder ere the boyman was on his feet, with his hand outstretched to his sword.

"Qui va?" he cried. "Holla! mon petit. By my hit! I thought there had been a canaille. What then, most noble?"

"Come hither by the window, Aylward," said Alleyn. "I have seen four-score men pass from yonder glade, and high every man of them had a great burden on his back. What think you of it?"

"There are as many masterless rascals! There are as many masterless folk in this country as there are rabbits on Cowdray Down, and there are many who show their faces by night but would dance in a hempen collar if they stirred forth in the day. On all the French marches are droves of outcasts, rascals, and lawless fellows, of whom I judge that these are some, though I marvel that they should just on come so nigh to the castle of the seneschal. All seems very quiet now," he added, peering out of the window.

"They are in the further wood," said Alleyn.

"And there they may bide. Back to rest, mon petit; for, by my hit! each day now will bring its own work. Yet it would be well to shoot the bolt in yonder door when one is in strange quarters. So!" He threw a sudden shout upon his pallet and in an instant was fast asleep.

It might have been about three o'clock in the morning when Alleyn awoke from a troubled sleep by a low cry or exclamation. He listened, but, as he heard no more, he set down as the challenge of the guard upon the walls, and dropped off to sleep once more. A few minutes later he was disturbed by a gentle knocking at his own door, as though some one were pushing cautiously against it, and immediately afterwards he heard the soft tread of cautious footsteps upon the stair which led to the room above, followed by a confused noise and a muffled groan! Alleyn sat up on his couch with all his nerves in a tingle, uncertain whether these sounds might come from a simple mad-gone sick archer and visiting leech perhaps—or whether they might have a more sinister meaning. "Here is a cry of horror Alleyn!" said John Aylward. "The moonshine softens a man's heart. Now we may use the eyes which God hath given us."

"By my hit!" cried Aylward, as the yellow flame flickered up, "it is indeed young master Ford, and I think that this seneschal is a black villain, who dare not face us in the day but would murder us in our sleep. By the twang of string! if I do not soak a goose's foot with his heart's blood, it will be no fault of Samkin Aylward of the White Company."

"But, Aylward, think of the men whom I saw yesterday," said Alleyn. "It may not be the seneschal. It may be that others have come into the castle. I must go to see. Now, my friend, let me go. Aylward, for my place is by his side."

"One moment, mon gar. Put that steel headpiece on the end of my yew staff. So! I will put it first through the door; for it is ill to come out when you can lump Aylward! This now, comrades, on! Hols, by my hit! it is time that we were stirring!"

As he spoke, a sudden shouting broke forth in the castle, with the scream of a woman and the rush of many feet. Then came the sharp clink of clashing steel, and a roar like that of an angry lion—"Notre Dame Du Descent! St. Ives! St. Ives!" The boyman pulled back the bolt of the door, and thrust out the headpiece at the end of the bow. A clash, the clatter of the steel-cap upon the ground, and ere the master who struck could heave up for another blow, the archer had passed his sword through his body. "On, comrades, on!" he cried, and, breaking fiercely past two men who threw themselves in his way, he sped down the broad corridor in the direction of the shouting.
