THE SECRET OF GORESTHORPE GRANGE

BY A. CONAN DOYLE. Her voice died away in a beautifu out her hands as in supplication. I an always sensitive to female influences Besides, what would Jorrock's ghost b Mrs. Fales—On the contrary, he says that he can't help meeting them at every tem by interviews with such creatures are seldom.

my last visitor, unless I decided at once she gave me a seraphic smile, as if she knew what was passing in my mind. That smile settled the matter. "She will do!" I cried; "I choose this one;" and as, in my enthusiasm, I took a step to ward her, I passed over the magic circle which had girdled me round.

which had girdled me round.

"Argentine, we have been robbed!"

I had an indistinct consciousness of these words being spoken, or rather screamed, in my ear a great number of times without my being able to grasp their meaning. A violent throbbing in my head seemed to adapt itself to their rhythm, and I closed my eyes to the lullaby of "Robbed! robbed! robbed!"

A vigorous shake caused me to one. A vigorous shake caused me to open them again, however, and the sight of Mrs. D'Odd, in the scantiest of costumes and most furious of tempers was sufficiently impresive to recall all my scattered thoughts, and make me realize that I was lying on my back on the flow of Matilda, I began gradually to recollect the events of the night. There was the door through which my supernatural visitors had filed. There was the circle of chalk, with the hieroglyphics round the edge. There was the cigar-box and brandy bottle which had been honored by the attentions of Mr. Abrahams. But the seer himself—where was he? and what was this open window, with a rope running out of it? And where, oh, where, was the pride of Goresthorpe Grange, the a glimpse of the melancholy specter with the trailing garments, nor do I expect that I ever shall. In fact, my night's experiences have cured me of my mania for the supernatural, and quite reonciled me to inhabiting the hundrum nineteenth-oentury edifice on the outskirts of Lon-don which Mrs. D. has long had in her nind's eye.

As to the explanation of all that As to the explanation of all that occurred—that is a matter which is open to several surmises. That Mr. Abrahams, the ghost hunter, was identical with Jemmy Wilson, alias the Nottingham crackster, is considered more than probable at Scotland Yard, and certainly the description of that remarkable burglar tallied very well with the appearance of my visitor. The small bag which I have described was picked up in a neighboring field next day, and found to contain choice ssortment of jimmies and centerbits. Footmarks, deeply imprinted in the mud on either side of the moat, showed that an accomplice from below had received the sack of precious metals which had been let down through the open bad been let down through the open window. No doubt the pair of scoundrels, while looking round for a job, had overheard Jack Brocket's indiscreet inquiries, and had promptly availed themelves of the tempting opening.

And now as to my less substantial vis itors, and the curious, grotesque vision which I had enjoyed—am I to lay it down to any real power over occult matters possessed by my Nottingham friend? For a long time I was doubtful upon the point, and eventually endeavored to solve it by consulting a well-known analyst and medical man, sending him the few drops of the so-called essence of Lucoptolycus which remained in my vial I append the letter which I receive from him, only too happy to have the opportunity of winding up my little narrative by the weighty words of a man

"Dear Sir,—Your very singular case has interested me extremely. The bottle which you sent contained a strong solution of chloral, and the quantity which you describe yourself as having swallowed must have amounted to at least eighty grains of the pure hydrate. This would, of course, have reduced you to a partial state of insensibility, gradually going on to complete coma. In this semi-unconsolous state of chloralism it is not whusual an hour when she fancied she heard choking with laughter and crying."

"I will be most happy to do so," was the response, and out stepped the awful-looking man.

He soon settled the quespretty certain the minister was den, but they had always managed to effect a retreat before they could be killed. The fact that these unpleasant neighbors were so close caused the lady no small anxiety on behalf of her only son, a boy of four years. One day she left the boy asleep in his cot upon the verandah, and was busying herself about her household duties, when she was attracted to the back door by a curious huzzing noise, and to her horror she saw the brown snake there, standing almost straight up, waving to and fro, and glying forth the noise which had attracted hold of the woman's dress, and she, being forth from the house and across the yard. When they arrived at the underground tank, about 100 yards from the house, the woman saw the reason of this strange visit; for there was her little boy (he had strayed from his bed and fallen in the tank) the other snake hold. fallen in the tank) the other snake hold and very pleasantly requested her ing him by the hair of his head, strain-

The girl who marries a poor man will then be able to economize without difficulty, and she who is to be rich can then manage her large house and numerous servants with success, to knowing just how everything should be done from the kitchen up.

MABEL'S THIEF.

Oh, no! Llyton village was not behind the times. It boasted a saw-mill, two stores, a school house and a church. There was also a new minister: but even the knowledge that there was such a venerable person in the place did not prevent some 'hardened sinner' from breaking into Mr. Mott's store several times, and marching off with all the valuables he could lay his hands on. Deacon Sawyer had heard of these depredations, and as he, with his wife and son, was leaving home one day at noon, and not expecting to be back till dark, he called laughingly back to his daughter

It was only very gardually that my misty brain took these things in, and grasped the connection between them.
