Streets of the Future City.

(Philadelphia Record.)

New York is passing out of the skyscraper stage into that of towers. A second tower building is now approaching completion in New York, and with every extension of transit facilities a few storeys are added to the average height of buildings. Within the last dozen years the lower part of Manhattan has been covered by buildings of more storeys than anybody but the elevator men can keep track of. A few years ago New York's only connection with Long Island and New Jersey was one bridge and a lot of ferries. Now the ferryboat is following the horse car into oblivion. There are four bridges and a tunnel to Brooklyn, and there will soon be another tunnel. There is one tunnel to New Jersey, and the Pennsylvania tunnel and another one are unfinished.

Vastly greater crowds of people can reach lower New York. There they can be accommodated by increasing the height of buildings from fifteen or twenty to forty or fifty or sixty storeys. But what about the streets? They cannot be widened. New York has three street levels, the surface, underground and elevated. But three-storey streets will not accommodate the people going to and from forty-storey buildings.

Philadelphia is beginning to find itself face to face with a similar problem. We have begun on underground railways and overhead railways. But our streets are generally narrow and our buildings are getting taller. With every extension of transit facilities the throngs in the streets increase, and one level above is as much as now seems practicable. In New York two-storey elevated railroads have been seriously discussed, and it looks as if they would have to come, and perhaps sub-subways will have to come. Our area is less contracted and our population is less, so that we shall probably not have to go to such extremes. But the great problem of the future city is the streets. It is not whether they can be made deep enough and high enough to accommodate the inhabitants of buildings that are steel bridges set up on end.

Sometimes.

Across the fields of long ago
A little lad with face aglow—
The lad I used to be.

And yet he smiles so wistfully,
Once he had crept within—
I think that he still hopes to see
The man I might have been!

WASHINGTON'S MAXIMS

Reprinted From "The Philadelphia Album," February 22, 1924.

Treat with men at fit times about business, and whisper not in the company of others.

Make no comparisons, and if any of the company be commended for any brave act of virtue, commend not another for the same.

Be not apt to relate news, if you know not the truth thereof.

In discussing of things you have heard name not your author always. A secret discover not.

Be not curious to know the affairs of others, neither approach to those that speak in private.

Undertake not what you cannot perform, be careful to keep your promise.

When you deliver a matter, do it without passion and discretion, however mean the person may be who do it to.

When your superiors talk to anybody, hear them, nor neither speak nor laugh.

In disputes be content to let others come as not to give liberty to each one to deliver his opinion, and submit to the judgment of the major part, especially if they are judges of the dispute.

Be not tedious in discourse, make not many digressions, nor repeat often the same matter of discourse.

Speak not evil of the absent, for it is unjust.

Make no show of taking great delight in your virtues, feed not with greediness, cut your bread with a knife, lean not on the table, neither find fault with what you eat.

Be not angry at table, whatever happens, and if you have reason to be so, show it not; put on a cheerful countenance, especially if there be strangers, for good humor makes one dignified.

Set not yourself at the upper end of the table; but if by your due, or the master of the house will have it so, content it not, lest you should trouble the company.

When you speak of God or His attributes, let it be seriously, in reverence and honor, and obey your natural parents although they be poor.

Let your recreations be manifold, not sinful.

Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire called conscience.

Ventilation of the Mauretania.

So much is said in the papers now-a-days about each new Atlantic liner that the public comes to feel a sense of curiosity as to the vessels, and many persons whose sea voyages never have been or never will be farther than Coney Island become enthusiastic over speed records and are loud in their praises of the new craft.

The old traveler who has crossed and recrossed the ocean and in whose mind linger keen recollections of foul or smelly air in bad weather asks if they "have learned how to ventilate her?"

The Mauretania presents some distinct advantages in this direction, which are described by the Liverpool correspondent of the Lancet. He notes that passengers have a propensity to open some thing in order to get fresh air. "They are so accustomed to open a door or window at home that when they reach a cabin their habit must be gratified or they will insist that they are not getting proper ventilation." The new vessel shows the usual cowls on the uppermost deck, but these ventilate the engine-room, and have nothing to do with the cabins and saloons. The new system seems to be independent of the opening and closing of various ventilators within the passengers' reach, and its triumph seems to lie in the fact that he may open what he likes without disturbing the ventilation. All the passenger cabins and saloons and the crew quarters are supplied with compressed air. In other words, the air in every habitable portion of the ship is under greater pressure than the outside atmosphere, except in the lavatories. Thus, if a cabin door opens, the air rushes out of and not into the cabin. In case of the lavatories the process is reversed. The system is known as the thermo-tank system. No less than sixty-five of these machines, says the Lancet correspondent, are placed in different parts of the vessel. They consist of a strong metallic case containing in one part an electric fan of such power that it can pump down into the ship 4,500 cubic feet of air per minute. This means a grand total of 250,000 cubic feet of fresh air from the upper deck per minute. Within each of these apparatuses are a number of coils that can be filled with steam, and thus the air is warmed before it is pumped into the ship. The ventilation in no wise depends on the weather or the wind, but wholly and solely on the rapidity in the revolution of the fans. The shafts that communicate with the lavatories do not serve as inlets, but as outlets; the current is, therefore, to the lavatory and out by shafts, and these about the outer funnel. Thus the air from the lavatories is discharged into the open at the top of the funnels with the smoke. The lavatories are flushed from a large tank of sea water on the upper deck. Even in the highest closet there is a water head of fifty-five feet. The flushing is therefore done with great force and thoroughness. For the steerage passengers, many of whom have never seen a modern toilet, all the apparatus is arranged to work automatically, and the whole compartment containing their toilets and bath tubs is tiled and can be washed out with a hose.

Many a man with one foot in the grave does enough kicking with the other one to make up for it.

If our good intentions were all realized the devil would have to open bids for a net.

FURNACE ACCIDENT MOULDER'S HAND INJURED

Mr. William Burdett who works for the Canadian Westinghouse Co., at Hamilton, and resides at 108 Simcoe Street East, says: "As the direct result of a heavy mould being rolled over, as I was assisting other workmen to line a furnace, I sustained a severe injury to my left hand. Had this mould fallen it would undoubtedly have crushed both fingers and hand, as it was, I escaped with a bruised, blackened, and much swollen member. By the next morning my hand was so cramped and stiffened it was impossible to hold or lift any object. By noon the same day there was no improvement, although my hand had been bathed and well rubbed with liniments we had in the house. My wife having used Zam-Buk previous to this, now persuaded me to use for a box, which I did. Regular applications of this ointment well rubbed in over the injured and swollen member, soon drew out all discolorations, banished the swelling and worked so effectively that by the beginning of the week my hand was well again and I could go to work. I have suffered no inconvenience since and would recommend Zam-Buk to all workmen." The secret of Zam-Buk's clean and painless healing lies in the fact that it imitates Nature's own "healing by first intention." It is composed of pure vegetable saps and juices, which soothe the pain and allay inflammation by effective antiseptic and germicidal action. No toilet should be without it!

Our Scotch Corner

Reminiscences of Androssan.

The interests of Androssan Burgh in the early sixties were, as far as I am a member, entrusted to Provost Barr, who held the position as Chief Magistrate for the period of forty years, and in recognition of his long and valuable services was presented with his portrait, which still adorns the walls of the Town Hall, where also are to be seen portraits of the thirteenth Earl of Eglinton and Dr. Macdougall. To the last-named there was also raised the monument on the Castle Hill to mark the gratitude and esteem of the citizens for the doctor as a public benefactor. Supporting the provost about the time I have named were Bailies James Willock, of the Holm; David Barrie, grocer; John Hogarth, ironmonger; Arch. Currie, clothier; and Thomas Gilliland, painter. The duties of Town Clerk were ably discharged by James O. Mack, assisted and succeeded later by the present clerk, James Cook. The office of fiscal was vested in John Emslie, and the protection of the lieges rested in the capable hands of Joe Mullock, who also acted as sheriff officer and town clerk. The registrar was Hugh Willock, ironmonger, while the declaration of marriages was entrusted to Dr. Marshall, schoolmaster, Saltcoats. Prior to the gas and waterworks becoming the property of the burgh, Thos. Kirkhope acted as secretary and collector of rates, and the forces prevailed then were as capable, if not more so, of serving and satisfying the interests of the ratepayers, with due regard to economy, as is exercised to-day under altered conditions. Ned Elvan discharged the duties of scavenger, and assisted Joe occasionally in conveying obnoxious drunks and incapables to the cells. Archie Nicol supervised the waterworks, followed by James Crawford, and the gas works had a good manager in Hugh Nicol, succeeded by the present Wm. Galtbraith. The professional element had able representatives in Drs. Stevens, father of the present postmaster; Dr. Wallace, father of the energetic Dr. Wallace, Saltcoats; and Dr. Beattie Robertson, the last mentioned finding successors in the persons of Drs. Allan and Macdonald. The principal medicinal properties and cures for all diseases were castor oil, salts and senna, seditiz powders, sulphur and treacle, and the fail-me-never skelly or quail for internal complaints, with mustard poultice, pepper and whisky, turpentine and fly blisters for external use.

Thrown Away on Him.

Jackson—Well, what did your wife say to you when you got home so late last night? You know you were afraid she'd scold. Fairleigh—My wife's a jewel. She didn't scold a bit. In fact, she didn't even ask me where I had been or what had delayed me, but, late as it was, she sat down at the piano and began to play and sing. I tell you she's one in a thousand. Jackson—What did she sing? Fairleigh—Oh! that fine song, "Tell Me the Old, Old Story."

Willie Got Left.

The boy came into the house weeping. "What's the matter, Willie?" asked his mother. "The boy across the way hit me," he replied. "Oh, well, I wouldn't cry for that," returned the parent. "Show me that you can be a little man." "I ain't crying for that," he retorted. "Then what are you crying for?" "He ran into the house before I could get at him."

Examining His Class.

"Can any boy tell me," asked a teacher

No. 581—Infants' set, consisting of a pretty round yoke dress, a plain little slip, a kimono, barra-coat, night-gown and petticoat. The daintiest of needlework and materials as fine as one's purse will allow, are the requisites when planning the outfit for the wee baby. The sheerest and finest of nainsook or Persian lawn is used for the dresses, and no prettier finish could be desired than a deep hem with a cluster of hand-run tucks above it. The little dress here illustrated is gathered to a round yoke made of alternate bands of tucking and fine Swiss embroidery. A touch of hand work always gives a distinction that nothing else will, and the yoke might be embroidered with a tiny spray across the front. Longcloth was used for the little slip and also for the night-gown, which is the simplest of garments to make. The sleeves are cut in one with the body of the gown and box-pleats are laid in at the shoulders to be let out as baby grows. The petticoat is known as the "Gertrude," and buttons at the shoulders. It is a vast improvement over the old style petticoat with a waist, as it slips on and off easily and avoids the necessity of pins. The kimono is one of the most useful of garments for the baby; it is made of soft, white flannel and ties together with ribbons under the arm, so there is no pulling and twisting of the little arms in putting it on. The edges may be button-holed or feather-stitched with white or colored silk. The dress will require 2-1/2 yards of 36-inch material for the making. The little slip will take 2-1/4 and the petticoat, night-gown and kimono will each require two yards. The barra-coat will need one yard of flannel for the skirt, and 1-1/2 yard of cambric or muslin for the body.

Infants' set, consisting of round yoke dress, slip, petticoat, known as the "Gertrude," barra-coat, kimono and nightgown.

This complete set of patterns will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in money or stamps.

When to Wed.

Marry when the year is new,
Always loving, kind and true;
When February birds do mate,
You may wed nor dread your fate;
If you wed when March winds blow
Joy and sorrow both you'll know,
Marry in April when you can
Joy for maiden and for man,
Marry in the month of May,
You will surely rue the day,
Marry when the June roses blow,
Over land and sea you'll go,
They who in July do wed
Must labor always for their bread,
Whoever wed in August be
Many changes are sure to see,
Marry in September's shine,
Your living will be rich and fine,
If in October you do marry
Love will come but riches tarry,
If you wed in bleak November,
Only joy will come, remember,
When December's snow falls fast
Marry, and true love will last.

A Distinction Without a Difference.

Five-year-old Deborah had been invited to the luncheon at a restaurant with Miss K.

"Do you like cocoa?" she was asked.

"When the answer was 'Yes,' the beverage was duly brought, but remained untasted.

Just Miss K. said, "Why don't you drink your cocoa, Deborah, when you said you wanted it?"

"I didn't say I wanted it," replied the child politely; "I only said that I liked it."—Woman's Home Companion.

"Rastus, I hope you are doing something to provide for the future." "Yes, Mr. Blankley, I surely is. I got married yesterday."—Town and Country.
