The usual custom with Englishman and Americans is to shorten speech in every possible manner. "The English," said Vottore, "gain two hours a day by cutting their words," And a certain Swedish a massador, commenting on their harried peech, said, 'The English spetter out one-half a word and sxallow the est." But with regard to the word the rule seems to be violated. This word, the most abused in our langame, econstantly used "in season and out of season. "I have got is heard tentimes where "I have" is heard once; yet the "got" in this case is not only unnecessary, but most writers call it absolucely improper. "I have got" does not man to go s ss, but ref rs to the act of h ve posse s' would be fully as grammas tice as the expression "I have got;" yet r. The use of this word has up mand of an old man to his wire on a cold winter as raing: "Wite, w fe, get up, an get the breakfast; for the breakfast of to be got, and you've got to get up and get t."
