CHAPTER XXII.

A FOUL DEED—THE MISSING ONE.

"It cracked loudly, it gave way, and George felt himself falling. He uttered one loud cry, looked up for the last time at the beaming stars, and went whirling down into the darkness. He had

With bated breath the two murderers bent forward, listening to the dull, muffling rumble of his fall. They heard the sound of the heavy body striking first one side and then the other in its decent, till at last, at a great depth, it plunged into water—and all was still.

The silence of death which proclaimed the consummation of the crime, instantly filled their guilty souls with horror, and after standing for some moments in motionless rigidity they started back, and by a common impulse fled from the spot —panning, not in their rapid walking, and speaking not a word till they had crossed several fields and entered the ark.

Then the distance which separated them from the foul deed producing within them a sense of safety, they stood still and drew breath.

"Well," said Stephen, "that danger is removed."

"It is, surely and safely," returned

Garret.

"Safely!" repeated Stephen, with a sneering look. "Ar't certain of that? Is there no danger of discovery?"

"How should there?"

"Have we left no marks?"

"None that can connect us with the business. Marks there must be, for the fellow struggled desperately, but they can reveal nothing. If Greigson raises the line and sees that the youth is missing—as 'his like he will—and a search be made, and the searchers go in the direction of the mine, and see the broken bars—"

"Ay—what then?" gasped Stephen.

"Why, then, they will conclude the young man fell down the shaft by accident, and there's an end of it."

"But suppose the body should be got out?" suggested Stephen.

"I don't believe it will," returned Nathan. "The great depth and the water at the bottom will make it impossible for the corpse to be fished out.

But even if it should, what does it matter? The body can reveal nothing."

"You forget—the mark of the blow will be seen."

"Fahaw," said Garret, "there must
