The whom Stanley himself was hardly able to manage, in addition to keeping control own a camp of natives. Troup quotes a letter from Stanley to Bartelot, in which Stanley approach of the terms of the contract wifh Tippoo, but it was reported that the promise to supply payment was to be Emin's vory. He declares it was in obedience to Stanley's orders that the rear column with the clares it was in obedience to the wind and that the clares it was in obedience to Stanley's orders that the rear column was to be protest until Tippoo's arrival, when the column started with all that the porters would carry. Troup asks whether considering the disasters that even then befull them, Stanley could have expected their miserable camp, which had been denuded of able men by Stanley, to advance without Tippoo's help. He relies upon Stanley's orders to Bartelot to refute the charges of delay. He says after seven and a half months had passed Bartelot to refute the charges of delay. He says after seven and a half months had passed Bartelot were willing to try to advance, but the remainder, including himself, dissented, because Stanley had impressed upon them the importance of preserving the stores. He repeats that Bartelot had ample warning of the danger he incurred in venturing out alone. Troup is inclined to acquit Tippoo Tib of the charge of treachery, and thinks the latter met with considerable difficulty in collecting porters. The book consists largely of interesting details of the experiences of the rear column and Troup's correspondence with Stanley since the return of the expedition. offer of $150,000 for its mill.
