Lola's Secret,

A Romance.

Lord Fielden was listening intently. "Did she speak to you, Gertrude?" he asked.

"No—only a few words. I think she said, 'I am quite well.'"

"Did you notice her voice; any peculiarity in it?" he asked.

"No, I cannot say that I did. But you see, Harry, it was no fancy. Was it, Lady Fielden?"

"No, my dear, I begin to think not. Harry, you had better take a couple of men out with you and search the grounds. I feel uneasy."

"I will go first myself," he said, and he did.

But he found no one. Close to the window, however, there was a broken spray of passion flower and some rose leaves, as though some one had pulled aside the branches in order to look in. That was the only suspicious circumstance. Then the butler and two footmen accompanied Lord Fielden through the grounds. Mme. St. Ange, from her hiding-place among the ferns, saw the reflection of the light that they carried, but they failed to discover her. Harry was grave and thoughtful that evening. Lady Fielden said that there was no cause for any anxiety; evidently it was a woman who had some idea of begging from them, and who was curious to see the inmates.

So the household retired to rest, and a little anxious and more on the alert than usual. The rumor that a woman had made her way through the park and had been found looking in at the dining-room window had somewhat startled the servants, but no one was seriously alarmed. Lord Fielden was the only one who could not rest. An idea had entered his mind. Who could be rude and abrupt to the beautiful and kindly girl? Who would come creeping up to the house and run such a risk as standing by the window, unless it was some one whose interest it was to watch Gertrude, and who had a keen curiosity to see her? Could it—her, and with the knowledge came an access of despair. "It made her strong that this time she almost tore herself from her captor's grasp."

"No," he said, "I will not hurt you. I could bind you fast this moment if I liked, but I will not. If it pleases you, though, we will stand here until morning, until daylight dawns—so that I may see, if you will not tell me, who you are."

"It was as much as he could do to hold the strange woman, but he kept her hands tightly grasped in his. How long a time passed in the terrible struggle he could not tell. He found presently that she was panting for breath, and that in a short time she must be still from sheer exhaustion. So it happened. After a few more efforts to free herself she gave up struggling, and stood panting and trembling. Then came a long-drawn sigh, a low piteous cry.

"For heaven's sake let me go, let me go!" she murmured.

"Tell me who you are, and what you want," he said, "and you shall go the next moment."
