Stepping Stones. Kittie L. Weston, a niece of Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Marshall, of Paradise, and recently read in the department of the College Fine Arts, connected with the Methodist Church at San Diego, California.

Tripping gaily through the meadow, On a pleasant summer day, A little maid with busy fingers, Plucks the flowerlets on her way.

Singing brightly as she journeys, All about the leaves and roses, Takes no heed of time or distance Thinking only of her posies.

On she goes across the bridges,
Where the laughing waters play,
Heeding not the darkening shadows,
Gathering at the close of day.

Till a sudden burst of thunder Causes her to turn dismayed, a
And she sees the flower-strewn forest,
Gloomy with the evening shade.

Gazing timidly around her, Phantoms seem to grin and stare, While she hears sounds strange and In the thunder ladened air.

Longer now she dare not linger, Turns to seek her home once more, But alas the path is hidden, Which had seemed so plain before.

Hastening deeper in the woodland, Now another sound she hears, And the noise of rushing waters, Falls upon her frightened ears.

Flying onward in her terror, In the distance, Ah! behold! What she left a gurgling stream! New a river deep and bold. Now the sloping bank she reaches, Stops and gazes in dismay, For the bridge she crossed so lately, Has been swiftly borne away.

Out access the darkening waters, Just beyond the dancing foam, New and then she catches glimpse Of the evening light at home.

Blessed home-spot; where the loved Safely housed so safe and warm, Call in vain the little maiden, Wandering in the night and storm.

Oh! for help to cross the current Must she stay all night alone? In the shadow-haunted forest, Where the wierd trees creak as

Where the wind shrieks awful music, Mingling with the thunder's roar, And the sound of many waters, Ever louder than before.

While from out the gloomy arches, Spectral figures seem to rise, Shapes as from the awful ghost-land, Flit before her straining eyes. Half distracted with her terro Knowing not which way to fly, uddenly, she hears the music

Of what seems a friendly cry. Breathless, stands the little maiden, Listening, with her cheeks aflame, Listening, with her heart scarce beating, Thinks she hears one speak her name.

In the pauses of the thunder,
While the stormy wind still moans,
"Higher up my little pilgrim,
Ye shall find the "Stepping Stones."

These words hears the little wanderer, Thrilling through the shadowy glades, And before hope's brightening picture, Half the gloom around her fades.

Blue eyes straining through the darkness, Catch no glimpse of form or face, But the echo of the music, Seems to fill the lonely place. As she breathless stands and listens,

Come again those silvery tones, 'Higher up my little pilgrim, Ye shall find the Stepping Stone Turning as the sweet voice bids her,

Following the accents kind, Lo! A pathway opes before her, And the woods are left behind. Broad and deep and still the river, Stretches now before her view, But a row of wave-washed boulders, Form an easy pathway through.

Joyously she bounds across it, Meeting on her brightening way, Friends still seeking in the darkness, For the wanderer gone astray.

In the home-nest now she's sheltered. By affection's loving arms,
Tempts no more the gloomy forest,
Filled with eventide's alarms.

But e'er thinks with fond remembrance Of the friend unseen but near,
Who helped her when the day was darkest,
To find the pathway broad and clear.

Ye who travel life's broad pathway When the shadows gather fast, See the flowers of early promise, Rudely scattered by the blast.

See dark troubles thickly gather, O'er the path so bright and fair, Leading to that beauteous country, Where is peace beyond compare.

Happy are ye if ye find one, Ready there to take your hand, Ready there to guide your footsteps, To the brighter, better land.

When the waves of care and hardship, Roll and surge around your way, When the path seems girt with terrors, And clouds hide the light of day.

Angel forms of help and courage, Then may say in silvery tones, "Higher up my weary pilgrim, Ye shall find the Stepping Ston Do the friends you loved and trusted, Faithless prove and turn away, Do the ones your heart holds dearest First grow cold and then betray.

'Higher up" and ever higher Seek friends changeless ever

When affliction deeply gathers, In dark clouds around your head, List, intently for the chorus, By the angel voices led.

Softly through the evening gloam, "Higher up my weary pilgrims Ye shall find the Stepping Stones." "Higher up ye care-worn trave

Turn your gaze to heights afar, Through the clouds that gather darkly Catch gleams of Hope's glistening a When the trials of your earth life, Shall have wearied heart and brain, When ye sink beneath your burdens, Lacking strength to rise again.

Trusting in the Father's guidance Reach to him a suppliant hand, Asking Him to lead your footsteps Safely to that better land.

Trusting in His guiding tones,
Through death's dark and stormy waters,
Ye shall find the Stepping Stones.

—Kittie L. Weston.

The Minnesota Tornado.

TERRIBLE SCENES ON THE LAKES. The terrible disaster on Lake Pepin, Minn., with the loss of nearly 125 lives by the swamping of the pleasure stmr. Sea Wing, has already been referred to in the tespatches. The details show the steamer had an excursion party on board returning from Camp Lakeview, the encampment of 1st Minnesota National Guards. The Sea Wing is a small craft, a sternwheeler, with Wing is a small craft, a sternwheeler, with

Wing is a small craft, a sternwheeler, with an upper cabin, and carried in tow an open flat barge. The little boat slowly struggled to the north, the wind bore her toward the Wisconsin shore, and as the clouds grew ominously black, suggestions came to return to port, but the captain thought the storm could be weathered. Suddenly the tempest descended. It was not a cyclone, but a fierce headlong tornado, that piled the waves mountain high and rent the forest on shore with a notentous crash that carried in tow an open in the little same good things for a speedy colt to have, but not one of them is the chief thing. The furry of the storm was soon absted, and just, as the few remaining ones were beginning, to think there was no hope of escape from death, the boat gave another plunge and again precipitated them into the waters as it turned back on its side. There was an other struggle between life and death, and a few more lives were lost before the side of the boat could be reached. The storm showed signs of rapid abatement. The darkness which overhung the lake was dissipated, and in ten minutes a clear sky was unfurled above. The wreck of the Sca Wing drifted down until it struck the stranded barge, and from that point the recovery of bodies progressed. The cabin was pulled off, and then the stoutest hearts grew faint at the scane disclosed. Here was a young man's body floating cold and stiff, with the form of his sweetheart classed close to his heart. A mother with two children at her bosom floated next. Girls and boys and even babies, were locked together in the rigid embrace of death. The river is black with craft, surrounding the wreck, and cries and shricks follow rapidly the recovery of each body, showing the identification by a father of a wife or a daughter, a son of a mother, or a mother of a child.

AT LAKE GERVAISE.

—Canada, according to Dr. J. G. Bourinot, received the title of "dominion" instead of "kingdom," at the time of the confederation of the provinces in 1866, because the Earl of Carnarvon, then British Secretary of State for the Colonies, thought that the latter designation would be objectionable to the United States, which had just before so emphatically objected to the establishment of an empire in Mexce.

—At a recent garden party given by the Prince of Wales, Queen Victoria smiled on a number of prominent New York ladies and gentlemen, and spoke very pleasantly to them, and the result is that they were much pleased. Depew speaks of the Queen as "a wonderful woman." He was much pleased with the way her face lights up when she smiles,
