-WE really do not believe that our coun cillors have anything to conceal about the action of the insane asylum, and it is therefore to be regretted that a detailed statement of the expenditure in conr with that work was not properly audited and given to the public. Even though there may not be the slightest suspicion of wrong about the matter, the people of the county, whose money has been spent, have a right to the fullest information upon the subject. They assuredly have a right to be informed where their money has gone, who received it, and for what it was paid. Not only is it due to the people that all these details be made public, but the councillors who composed the committee owe it to themselves, as well, to give the information, in order that there may be no room for any suspicion fact that it may be believed, or even known, that everything is all right about the matter, does not alter or affect this right of the taxpayer to have the facts, or this duty of the nitee to give them. We therefore think that a detailed statement of the entire expenditure should have been prepared and properly audited before the late session of the council closed.

We are led to make these observations by the fact that a good many enquiries have been made of late as to the meaning of these apparent misunderstandings and partial repudiations we have seen and heard since the statement of the expenditure was published in our columns a few weeks ago. No sooner had we published the statement given us than Councillor Elliott casts suspicion upon

-There does not seem to be much sentimentalism about an English court of law. It does not appear to make much difference whether a man belongs to the aristocracy or the great unwashed when he is brought there accused of crime. He gets about the same measure of justice in either case. A few weeks ago Oscar Wilde was the prince of dudes and the pet of aristocratic society; he was an author of considerable fame and a member of several of the swell clubs of London, yet he was treated precisely as any other criminal when brought into court; and -- There does not seem to be much sentiother criminal when brought into court; and now comes the announcement that a jury

It was expected that the Income Tax would go far to make up the loss of revenue resulting from the reductions made in the McKinley tariff by the recent democratic revision. There has of late been a deficit of about five million dollars a month which the income tax was designed to meet. Now the Supreme Court of the United States Now the Supreme Court of the United States has declared such a tax unconstitutional, on the ground, mainly, that it is a direct tax which the central government has not the right to levy, that power being delegated by the constitution to the various states. This decision will render it necessary for Congress to increase the taxation in order to bridge the distance between revenue and expenditions.

Our Municipal Treasurer, it seems, did not quite like the item entered as "Treasurer $150," and on making enquiries learns that it should read "Secretary $150." There is not much information in all this, but there is just enough to lead a good many people to wonder what it all means. If the committee which had charge of the construction had a secretary who received $150 for his services, then it was clearly the duty of such an official to prepare a detailed statehis services, then it was clearly the duty of such an official to prepare a detailed statement of the expenditures, in order that they might be properly audited and published, as all other bills are. Principal Oakes has again been presented with a token of esteem. On Thursday evening, the members of the committee are anxious to conceal. If it should be found that there really is something wrong about the transaction which the members of the committee are anxious to conceal. If it should be found that there really is something wrong about the transaction, that our municipal council cannot trust some of its most prominent and respected members with the expenditure of ten thousand dollars, without finding that there has been some reason for complaint in connection with the affair, then most of us will feel like concluding that government of the people and by the people is a dismal failure.

—England's death-rate from liquor increases yearly. In 1869 there were 764 deaths caused directly by intemperance, or a rate of 34 per million of population; in 1889 the rate went up to 73 per million, the number of drink victims 2,174. The British government has always treated the traffic as legitimate. The first step towards its limitation is the proposed local option measure submitted to the House of Commons by Sir William Harcourt, by which the voters of any parisit can either veto the sale of intoxicants entirely, or reduce the number of public houses at which liquor can be bought. It will be a happy day for England when public opinion condemns the traffic as immoral and banishes it altogether.

The profile transformed; we neet the same profile transformed; we need to be the same profile transformed; we need to be the savior's praise. On Sunday, May 5, four believing ones publicly put on Christ in the ordinance of baptism. One of these had been a consistent member of the Methodist church for eleven years, and by a careful study of the Word was led to baptism. He concluded that he would follow the Saviour's example even though it should lead him into a Baptist church, for which he had never felt any special partiality. Others who are not yet walking with us are studying the Word—a most hopeful sign. We thank God and take courage."

In this county road machines have been tried with very satisfactory results. Where the conditions are at all favorable one machine will do the work of a dozen men in a given time and do it much better. Our neighbors need therefore have no misgivings about investing in two or three of these machines.
