

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

I HAVE NOW concluded all that I deem it necessary at present to say. The public, in this volume, have in their hands, as it appears to me, every thing necessary to enable them to form a decisive opinion concerning the degree of confidence which my statements deserve. They have before them every thing like testimony which has been produced against me, together with the means of satisfying themselves on various points on which curiosity has heretofore been excited.

It is my intention, at some future time, to lay before the public certain additional statements already communicated to judicious individuals, and, indeed, committed to paper.

For the present, I will only remind my readers of the sentiments expressed in the Preface of this volume, and assure them that I desire nothing so much as to see my sad and painful story producing the effects for which it has been brought before the world—viz. the delivery of my late fellow prisoners in the Black Nunnery, and the safety of all others who may be exposed to the evils I have suffered.
