

In the latter case, the insidious artifice, instead of fostering malevolence under the wing of virtue, will effectually defeat its own intention. It will baffle the views of the dedicatory ; and far from affording the sanction of Lord Rawdon's name to his work, will detract from the credit that might be due to his own. I will not attempt to pass any panegyric upon Lord Rawdon ; he is far above my praise ; nor can his fame be affected by direct or implied detraction, or by any surreptitious use or abuse of his name. I take upon me to charge the Stricturist with this abuse.

It is not my intent or desire that the world should be informed whether Lord Rawdon does now approve
