As Hiram Sees It

"Say," said Mr. Hiram Hornbeam to The Times reporter, "what's a cocktail?" "I will illustrate," said the reporter. "Go ahead," said Hiram. "You are a British subject," said the reporter. "Yes, sir," said Hiram. "I be so— I'm proud of it." "That being so," said the reporter, "you are strong for law observance. It's British. It's the pride of all British subjects. They would not for worlds be a nation of law-breakers like the Yankees." "Yes, sir," said Hiram, "you hit the nail right on the head every time." "Being a farmer," said the reporter, "I don't know that the rest of the story applies to you. But if you were a leading citizen in a prohibition province you would not be content with mere assertion that you were a law-abiding citizen. You would want to drink the health of all law-abiding citizens. Need I say more?" "I guess I see the hint," said Hiram. "You are to be complimented on your powers of discernment," said the reporter. "I'm the cat's whiskers," said Hiram.
