WHAT DOES THE ADMIRALTY INTEND?

LOCAL NAVY LEAGUE IS INVESTIGATING

More Adequate Protection of British Interests is Object of Sea Lords' Flying Squadrons.

As was expected the local branch of the Navy League has taken active steps towards throwing light upon the admiralty's intentions in regard to the Esquimaux station. Communication has been entered into with the admiralty in London in regard to the recent reduction in the strength of the Pacific northwest naval force. No definite information has been received, but London officials, who are in close touch with the admiralty, are investigating. In the meantime the policy of Sir John Fisher and the admiralty has been outlined as far as known in letters to Secretary Pearson of the Navy League.

Seen Monday morning Mr. Pearson said that from what he had been able to learn from the Old Country and other sources, the report that a system of "flying squadrons" was contemplated was correct. It was evident the intention to do away with all obsolete vessels, lifting the navy to the highest possible standard of efficiency. Cruisers and battleships would be classified according to their speed and fighting qualities. Then they would be divided into many "flying squadrons" as might be deemed necessary, each to be formed of vessels of uniform rating. The squadron would be able to patrol and police the highways of commerce without being hampered by ships of unequal speed. "The admiralty," Mr. Pearson remarks, "have apparently recognized that it is by the nearest link the strength of the chain is judged, and are endeavoring to weed out the useless ships, classify those more up-to-date and organize a system by which a large force of efficient vessels may be concentrated at any given point within the shortest possible time."

A recent communication from the London Navy League makes an announcement interesting in this connection. It mentions the launching early in November of the Black Prince, a war vessel of an entirely new and novel design. In describing her the letter reads: "The dividing line between her and a battleship is slight. She is of an original type and will combine great speed with coal capacity, protection and high gun power."

R. Stuart, a member of the executive committee of the Victoria branch of the Navy League, is now visiting England. Upon request he visited the general secretary in London, and in an account of the interview the latter says: "I recently had a call from Mr. Stuart, who is a member of your committee, and had a very interesting conversation with him. He expressed concern at the proposed withdrawal of the small vessels, which have hitherto been stationed on the North coast. I have not yet any absolutely definite information on this matter, but I believe that the proposal is that certain powerful 'flying squadrons' should be sent to the coast to replace the small vessels. This would be a very serious matter, and they should be well prepared to meet it."

You must, of course, be aware that the small vessels have been in service for many years, and are well adapted for their purpose. They are not only useful for patrol and police work, but they are also useful for the protection of British interests. They are well adapted for their purpose, and they are well adapted for their purpose. They are well adapted for their purpose, and they are well adapted for their purpose.
