GET-AWAY-QUICK BALLINGAME

"Bet You Two Bits," Said Dudley.

The clock proved him a whole hour late when "Get-Away-Quick" Ballingame arrived at Carr, Lodi, Lott & Co's office. The day before Ballingame had been warned by Mr. Carr that he shouldn't be late again without a good excuse.

Dudley Jones, the bookkeeper, gave Ballingame a sour smile and asked him what he was going to tell the boss.

When 2 o'clock came and Ballingame had made no move, Dudley smiled one of his vinegar smiles and asked Ballingame if he was ready to let the stakeholder hand over that two bits. Ballingame growled.

At 2.30 Ballingame gave his hair a careful brushing, attended his finger nails and strolled over to the boss's room, stuck his head in and said in an offhand way:

"I'm just slipping out to buy a new hat, Mr. Carr."

The next morning Ballingame was on the job bright and early. "I certainly had an awful time getting a hat to fit," he said. "That's the trouble with having a 7 1/2 head."

"Gee," he said to the stakeholder, "that boy Baker's some ball player." And he slipped four bits into his vest pocket.
