Question:

Last week a man was convicted of possession of large amounts of child pornography. He was fined $2000, and the material and his computer were seized. Do you think this was fair?

↑ "No. You can pay the fine but no one knows what he's going to do next. He can do the same thing now in the States. Money doesn't seem like enough."
— Jodi Schnare, 2nd year Arts/Science

↑ "Not especially. They should have included some kind of treatment so he wouldn't be a future problem."
— Shawn Stewart, 1st year Physics

↑ "No. He needed a prison term as an exemplary punishment. Even though he didn't touch any kids, someone did to produce that porn."
— Michael Cross, History Professor

↑ "No, I don't think it's fair. I understand that there isn't enough money for the judicial system to punish people, but it's not enough to just fine him. He can do it again."
— Suhanya Edwards, 2nd year Biology

↑ "That's totally ridiculous. It's so slack. He could set something up somewhere else. I'd suggest something much more strict — six months imprisonment or something."
— Dan Makhan, 4th year Kinesiology

↑ "It's not enough for sure. He was a public leader. It has to be more severe. The punishment doesn't match the nature of the crime."
— Sunny Ho, 1st year Law

↑ "No, it's not enough."
— Cheryl Humble, 3rd year BSc

↑ "I definitely don't agree with it."
— Sylvia MacDonald, 3rd year Biology

↑ "It should have been a lot more. He should have got a sentence."
— Joanne Sweeney, 2nd year BSc
