wheat, your tea, your hides and all your other products.' Would that have conduced to Imperial unity? You are inviting the Empire again and again to engage in a controversy which cannot fail to be serious, and may frequently become bitter. That is not the way to promote Imperial unity. This policy is not to be accepted for the sake of the objects it seeks to promote. We think that the Government in the Imperial Conference has taken the right course, and, so far as being censured, deserve the commendation of this House.

Sir Robert Horne: -- "Mr. Bennett said in language which was perfectly explicit, that we had now come to the time when we must take every step, and that we dare not fail."

RE: LARGER MARKETS

Naturally, the larger amount you can sell, the less it costs, and, accordingly, the cheaper the prices at which you are able to offer your goods.
