THIS CATALOGUE contains the titles of an assemblage of books relating to KINGS, GOVERNMENTS, LAWS and TAXES, and should be interesting to Americans and Canadians alike who sing the praises of Democracy and Loyalty. We each and all enter and quit the world through the bottomless pit of taxation. The garment which first covers our precious form and the shroud in which we are rolled up at last, bear the inexorable image and superscription of the taxgatherer. There appears to be taxes either direct or indirect upon everything we eat, wear or use. We open our mouths only to be taxed, and are taxed again for closing them. Manufacturers tax the wholesalers, who tax the retailers, who in turn tax the consumer. The Government, leading the way, taxes upon everything we purchase from abroad or manufacture at home. We turn over our ground with a taxed plough, cut our corn with a taxed reaper, gather it with a taxed waggon, and thrash it with a taxed machine, and send it to customers over a railroad built out of taxes, and of which the taxpayers neither own or control a square foot or a single sleeper. We exchange our industry for property in order to be taxed, and educate ourselves to be still further taxed. We clothe ourselves with taxed garments, and can only keep ourselves from freezing by taxed fuel burned in taxed stoves, and brought over taxed railroads. We pay taxes on the medicine which restores us to health, and the doctor is also taxed who puts us to death — the iron and the brass nails of our own coffin being also taxed. The bride becomes a wife in a taxed robe, and gazes with the greatest satisfaction upon her taxed wedding ring, her family being raised by taxes, and become taxpayers or taxgatherers. We read our taxed books by the aid of taxed glasses under a taxed light. The common hangman despatches his wretched victim by the aid of a taxed rope; and this year of grace finds the wise men of the East puzzled as well as dazzled at the prospect of taxing electricity transmitted by means of wires to Canada from Niagara Falls, New York. FRIENDS and CORRESPONDENTS, seeing that these things are so, let not fear drive us, but let knowledge and love draw us — let us remember that righteousness and truth is the salt of morality, and that morality is the safety of humanity; let us awake with joy and alacrity, and emerge from isolation and selfishness to a knowledge of our duties, responsibilities and privileges as men and as brethren in the commonwealth of humanity, and REMEMBER THAT EACH MOTIVE, WORD OF ACTION is being STEREOTYPED FOR OR AGAINST US UPON the SCROLL OF ETERNITY.
