Mr. English Writes

ON VALLEY FORMATION.

Editor Evening Telegram.

Dear Sir,—When engaged with my criticisms of Mr. McGrath's book, I had to offer opposition to his statement that the valleys were formed by the rivers. I pointed out that this idea is opposed by Mr. Howley's theory, namely, that the valleys were formed by glaciers. I said that neither is correct. To support my contention, I beg space in your esteemed journal to offer the following comments.

In his report on The Mineral Resources of Newfoundland, March 5th, 1909, Mr. Howley says: "During the Post Pliocene glacial epoch, an immense ice mantle seems to have enveloped the whole surface of the country, and when, under more congenial conditions of temperature, this ice cap began to give way, its onward movement descending from the higher elevations towards the sea on every side, acted like a cyclopean ploughshare. It tore up, pushed, or carried along everything that came in its way, scattering broadcast over the surface in every direction innumerable granite and other boulders grooved, striated and polished the underlying rock surface, in a word, planed down the entire face of the country. Evidences of this great denuding agent are abundant all over the country, and it was the effect of this same agency which moulded it into its present contour of smooth, rounded, rolling ridges and low valleys. There are no sharp, serrated peaks, such as are seen in non-gla-ciated countries anywhere visible."

I look upon the foregoing as very poor teaching for a Director of Geological Survey. Let us see how it comports with established facts.
That glaciers are like ploughshares I deny. Their action is rather that of abrasive force. They polish and groove and scratch their beds, but this is not plowing. Their abrasive force is due to sand rocks and gravel that they carry along over the rocks beneath them. Nor did they tear these rocks from their beds. They were being carried along on their upper surfaces, and were washed into crevices and so found their way to the bottom. Rocks and other detritus carried by glaciers are known as moraine stuff. This rubbish fell from cliffs, wherever high land appeared above the course of the glacier, and were not torn down by the ice. Such transported stuff may be likened to the trees and other vegetation that growing along the course of a river fall into it and are borne along on its bosom. Beside these lateral moraines there are what are known as terminal moraines. These sometimes form huge mounds in front of the glacier and are pushed along in front of it, just as one might push snow from the sidewalk with a scraper. This also represents material that had at one time been carried on the upper surface of the ice. It was not, when under milder climatic influences they began to give way, that glaciers accomplished their polishing and grooving. True that even during that time they abraded the rocks, but their greater activity in that respect was during the period of their formation. Those ice rivers flowed down from the high land, and were made to flow by their own superincumbent weight, and continued to flow as long as additional snowfalls at their highest parts kept up the required weight.
They even over-rode lesser hills in their path. Glaciers do not altogether erode down on a mass, but they flow on themselves in a molecular manner, as metals, such as lead, iron, etc., are made to flow without fusion. Even the solid rocks of the globe have been made to flow without rupture, as putty may be caused to flow by simple pressure of the hand. "There are no sharp, serrated peaks, such as are seen in non-glaciated countries," true, but that is no evidence that glaciers have removed any serrated peaks that may have existed. To take that stand would be to deny the agency of sub-glacial disintegration. Bylot Island in the Arctic regions is almost completely buried under ice and snow, still it has serrated peaks, its contour presents an appearance of black sharp spires rising from a bed of pure white snow and ice. Those peaks are constantly sending down broken rock onto the surfaces of the glaciers. The forces of nature, water, frost and heat are forever opposed to the existence of cliffs or peaks and are constantly working to reduce them to a common level. In the ages that have passed since the removal of the ice from our land, who can calculate the amount of sub-aerial degradation that has taken place. Who can tell what peaks have been removed, just as the peaks of Bylot are even now being removed. Anybody at all acquainted with the dynamical aspect of geology must know that the surface of our globe has been subjected to tremendous stresses in its efforts to adjust itself to the contraction due to the cooling of its mass. In seeking relief from those stresses, hills and valleys were formed, the great lateral compression causing foldings into ridges and hollows.

I am prepared to meet anybody who has any fair argument to advance against what I have said both as regards the glaciers and the formation of valleys. Too long have we in this country been taking for granted whatever has been handed out to us by officialdom. It is time that we rise up and demand the best that is in us. When I started my criticism of Mr. McGrath's book, that gentleman tried to drive me from the field by contemptuously referring to me as a cook. Yes, I am a cook, and more a fairly good cook. I am more than that, and more than Mr. McGrath ever dared to be. Perhaps I could edit the Chronicle, too. I could scarcely think that an editor of a twentieth century journal could be guilty of such gross Toryism, such rank aristocracy.
Thank God we live in an age when books are cheap, and learning is open to all who wish to acquire it. How many noble examples have we in history of men who, born in humble circumstances, have been burning lights and models for all ages. In the field of geology we have an illustrious example in Hugh Miller who began his observations as a boy laboring in a quarry. That poor boy rose to be one of the greatest geologists of his time. Even to-day his are standard works. Mr. McGrath should hide his head in very shame of his ultra snobish insinuations directed against me.
You may hear from me again, Mr.
Editor. I may have some observations to make re coal prospecting in the interior. It is time, I think, that the question be debated.

An English Chemist Has Dis- covered How to Grow Hair.

In England the ladies have entirely abandoned wearing hats which is due entirely to this new discovery.
It has been proven that Henna leaves contain the ingredients that will positively grow hair. That they contain this long-sought-for article is proven every day.
The Americans are now placing on the market a preparation containing the extract from Henna leaves, which is having a phenomenal sale.
This preparation is called SALVIA, and is being sold with a guarantee to cure Dandruff and to grow hair in abundance. Being daintily perfumed SALVIA makes a most pleasant hair dressing. McMurdo & Co., your druggist, is the first to import this preparation into St. John's and a large, generous bottle can be purchased for 50c.
