AN ILL WIND.

To pay the gro cer for his butter I had to soak my lyre; my war like breast was all a-flutter with forty kinds of ire. I quoted passages from Dante, in my profound despair, and said I'd wreck the grocer's shanty, and pull the grocer's hair. And thenthat merchant mutter, "Cool own, cool down, my son! I wish that I could sell you butter at fifty ents the ton. For I am tired of hearing kickers who snort around and swear; I'm weary of the man who bickers and howls and paws the air. The grocers friend, is in no danger of salting wealth away; it is the hornyhanded granger who's getting rich tosaid, "If this thing helps the farmer, I'm sorry that I roared. When I was young and full of yearning for manood to begin, I used to do the weekly churning, and bring the henfruit in. And so I'll make no further splutter, no more I'll rant around; for I'm aware that country butter is worth two bones a pound."
