Concluded.

"Yow and then I met "Bibi," who slws nodded, looked wise, and assured me: Everything is going right with him."

Of couse, Louise and Fauline were not included to put up with the retirement, and one diy there was a frou-frou of draperies the hall, and they were besigning Artur's door.

"Why don't you come to the "Grenadiers' nowadays' asked Louise, with her most bewitching patt.

"Too busy, mademoiselle, too busy," answered Arthur, dabbing sway at a back ground.

The place was quiet as possible, and awaited the arrival of poor Arthur's father. The place was but little with a chamber of death, for Octave and Pauline and Analote, and Lasifrene, with the best intentions, would bang about, talking in loud whispers. Then Louise toole in, shuddering, and said the whole detective force were looking for Manuel, then strange silences would fall as some one's eyes rested, by chance, on the two windows. In one of these pauses, heavy steps were heard on the stair, the police gently opened the door, uncovering with mute respect, as they did so, and there entered a dignified, handsome old man in olerical dress, his stern face working a little with suppressed emotion.

In silence we withdrew to a corner. Slowly removing his hat he looked about
