hare was built of a form good for leaping. Strength was in its hind quarters. The horse Eclipse approximated to the hare-like model. In trotting the motion was differ-ent, and a different mechanism was re-quired. A more equal distribution of trength to the fore quarters was requi-

Besides form, what may be called "texture" was of consequence. One expression sometimes used in handling was, "he handles like a glass bottle." In general, the nervous energy accompanies the "closest texture."

He said the term "thorough-bred," was first used in England to denote Eastern As frequently used, it was a term of mere humbug

The Morgan horse was the one meant in his allasion to originate a breed in this coun-try. The horse was a colt produced at Springfield, Mass., in 1792. It was taken by the owner, Mr. Morgan, to the State of Vermont, in 1795. The sire of this colt was called "True Britain," which was stolen by one Smith from Gen. James De Lancey when the "Rangers" and "Cow Boys,' had their border quarrels. After the difficulties were generally terminated, the same Smith undertook to visit Gen. De Lancey. Smith was invited to breakfast, and De Lancey is said to have ordered his slaves to make certain preparations in the After breakfast he caused a halter to be put around the neck of Smith, and hung him in his barn. This was in the State of the above.

New York. Four of the male progeny of this favorite horse were kept entire. Their digestive organs were strong. The height was from 14 to 15 hands, and their weight was from 900 to 1000 pounds each. The horse "Blackhawk" was bred from ne of these four, called the "Sherman Morgan." Mr. Howard spoke at length of the Blackhawk strain of the Morgan race, and the differences between horses required for stables and coach horses.

He thought the idea of combining all qualities in one horse preposterous. This was sometimes advocated. But race horses, draught horses and roadsters should be each of different forms or models, in some respects. He considered it indispensable to keep the best specimens of each model as sires.

its foot and break a leg. The floor should be covered by a false bottom of half-inch, unplaned hemlock, not only to protect it toom being gnawed, but to prevent slip-ping. It is true a rabbit will breed every h in the year; but I advise the does ining idle in our severe winter months, as the young produced at that season sel-dom attain much perfection. "A most thorough ventilation is absolutely necessary to the health of the rabbits. while a close impure atmosphere is the sure source of much disease. Better an open woodhouse than a confined room. Rather than my rabbits should breathe a tainted atmosphere, I allow the thermometer in my rabbitrary to stand at from 10° to 15° of Fahrenheit, and occasionally it will, in the night, register the temperature to have been as low as zero--and this without any injury to the rabbits.

'On the subject of feeding, I would offer a caution against the use of lettuce when going to seed, and recommend green corn sown broadcast as an excellent substitute. Hay should be fed with a liberal hand ; no matter how coarse, it will oftentimes be preferred to oats; and if what is thrown out a cleaning the hutches is within the ach of cattle, they will eat it with avidreach of cattle, they will eat it with avid-ity. Universal as is the opinion that rab-bits must not be allowed water, I have found no ill effects from it, and have even substi-uted it for roots in the winter time with inted it for roots in the winter time with

"I recommend the novice never to buy young rabbits that have been only lately weaned from the doe, but take such as are nore than half grown, say from five to six months old. They are then ready to commence breeding, and require no other care than regular feeding and cleaning." ----

DISTEMPER IN DOGS .--- W. S. Sampson gives the Ohio Cultivator the following re-nedy for the distemper in dogs : "When first noticed, and before the ani final drags his hind legs, if possible, im-merse him all but his head in warm water, as hot as the flesh will comfortably bear, rubbing with the bare hand over the kideys, small of the back, urinary organs, ud under the whole length of the belly, r half an hour at a time, until no belly, for half an hour at a time, until no symp-toms remain ; always when taking the animal out of the bath, rub thoroughly dry with coarse towels. The disease is simply a disturbance of the secretions about the bladder and urinary organs, and all it wants is to restore them to equilibrium as soon as R. L. RESPECTFULLY informs the inpossible.
