

with which you see it now, will pass away; the sharp grief of love and friendship will become soothed; men will repair thither as they are wont to commemorate the great days of history; the same glance shall take in, and the same emotions shall greet and bless the Harbor of the Pilgrims, and the Tomb of Webster.

The text in this section is extremely faint and illegible, appearing as a series of light gray lines on the page. It seems to be a continuation of the text from the previous section, but the words are too faded to be transcribed accurately.
