PROFESSOR ANDREWS AND MARSH LANDS

An Interesting Lecture Before Summer School of Science

Regard to Future Crops

(Special Correspondence of The Sun)
RIVERSIDE, N. B., July S.—Professor W. W. Andrews, of Mount Alliano, president of the summer school of science, lectured in the Consolidated school building last evening on the very interesting topic of the rectaining of marsh lands. In order to have the use of biaschboards for illustration, one of the large class rooms was used for the meeting, which was certainly animated if it could have been of marsh lands ection, where the average yield of late years does not reach one ton per year, and consequently many marsh womers, month or visible. The lates of the consolidated by the prevention of reach one ton per year, and consequently many marsh womers, month or visible to get in at all. The magic title—"Three tons of hay per acre," was an alluring one to the residence of this marsh land section, where the average yield of late years does not reach one ton per year, and consequently many marsh womers, month or visible to get and the lines of lacts indicated by experimenters along the farmers would experiment as a peaker of exceptional force and fluency, and withal has had extendible to get and all the proper underdraining to content of the declining to content of the exception, Prof. Andrews said, this showed that it was a possibility—that certain conditions would produce this desirable result, and it was the duty of the farmer to experiment so as to produce these conditions. Also, it is told the marsh "used to" produce in this way. If marsh ever gave such a yield, said the speaker, it could be made to do so again. There was not a farm in Canada worn out, the average soil having sufficient fertility to warrant having sufficient fertility to warrant continuous cropping for 200 years, the trouble being the fertility was locked up in the grains of soil, which must be set free. Every soil might be described as a mass of very small rocks of the game general composition as the original rocks.

is worn completely away, for each little rocklet contained the same percentage of fertilizing elements as the original rock. When a soil seemed exhausted, there was either a deficiency of the elements of plant food in the soluble state, a deficiency which most frequently arises from a destruction of the humus or vegetable mould, which is the chief moisture-holding and bacteria-feeding element in the soil, due to an excess of acids and other huriful excretions, left in the soil by plant growth and plant decay.

The most important element in the soil was humus, and if this is burnt up, it must be replaced in order that the soil may become black and rich again. The essential elements of plant food were: 1st, Phosphates, supplied by fasic slag, bone meal and superphosphate; 2nd, Nitrates; 3rd, Potash. All these were necessary:—the phosphates made grain head up well; the nitrates caused a rapid growth, while the potash made heavy, sturdy plants.

Prof. Andrews dealt particularly with marsh lands, which were a peculiar soil. There were three remedies for poor marsh: 1st, The applying of slag and muriate of potash: 2nd, Flowing with the lide; 3rd, Hauling marsh mud. Flowing would, of course, be a perfect cure, and would last a hundred years, but it would cost $55 an acre, and there was also great difficulty in getting unity among the owners—so it was also great difficulty in getting unity among the owners—so it was a contact to the standard oil Co.

would cost from $30 to $40 an acre, and the application of fertilizers about $15 to $20. The latter appeared to be, therefore, the cheapest and the most feasible. The marsh should be properly cultivated, drained and the proper fertilizers used. This latter could be determined by experiment, and the speaker strongly urged the farmers to experiment with small portions at a time. One law would not apply to all kinds of marsh. The speaker himself had tried one acre of marsh with 400 lbs of basic slag and 3 casks of lime, and had doubled his crop. Soil done in this way would last six years, and it was not necessary for the farmers to buy the proprietary fertilizer, they could get the ingredients and mix them themselves.
