MEERSCHAUM. got his hat and went out into the street with him. When they were alone together M. Escriot asked, "What is your father's name?" "Akers," said the sailor. "I expect he wints to tell you about Mrs. Durnford's business. He wants to make an affidavit that she was innocent. I think. She teere, and he wants to right the woman, as he says he can, before he dies."

"Where has your father been?" asked M. Escript. thing to say. The r piety (in the old Latin sense) toward their fathers is more "I remember you now, and I thank you "Well, it was I that took him away out "Well, it was I that took him away out of this. He was too good for it, and so was I, though I never was so good as him. I took him away out of it, and I am proud on it. I took him to Field Lane, and then he went to Great Queen Street, and we went to the Chichester together, and we were both drafted into the Royal Navy."

"And where is my boy now?" said Mrs. Durnford, eagerly. "And where is my boy now?" said Mrs. Durnford, eagerly.

"Burn me if I know, ma'am. There was only eight of us drafted into the Queen's service that year, and he might be any where. I don't as much know what ship he went into, because I left the Chichester before he did. But don't you see what you have got to do, ma'am? You go to Field Lane, and they will remember him by his name of Meerchaum, which he always gave there, as elsewhere, because he thought it would do him harm to give his real one. Or you might go at once to Great Queen Street; they will track him for you at once."

The lad departed with an extremely grateful recollection of M. Escriot's generosity. The clew was got at once. Field Lane was the nearest place, and Mrs. Durnford went there at once. The manager was at home, and she asked him if he remembered a boy called Meer schaum.

"Yes, certainly, madam," he said; "I remember him very well—a fine handsome lad, marked with M. D. on his left fancy."

In those quarters the majority of a certain class of people disagree with the law because it interferes with them. How the School Board will get on there we do not know; badly, we doubt. Mrs. Durnford, however, was rather popular from having been in prison, and was considered to be quite one of themselves. Religious she was, certainly,—they all became religious when they were shot up—but otherwise an excellent woman. We all had our fault, and if sile was a little religious, she would, doubtless, with her good common sense, get over it in time.

Still she did not get over it, and Escould live her accusation down; hed sired her to do more. He was in the end right. But the telling of the lives of any reader. It is enough to say that. Mrs. Durnford got more and more intimate with the Escriots, that she prospered in trade, and sent miney to her husband, which he invested well. The exconvict woman le a.e. as well known in those parts for discriminate charity as the Escriots. But the husband was still in the Pacific, and could not come home. One night, a winter night, about seven o'clock, the Escriots, grandfather and granddaughter, were sitting together, with then How the School Board with the new How the School Board with the second of the School Board with the Law Deadle of th The state of the s 1875. INTERNATIONAL STEAMSHIP CO'Y "Where has your father been?" asked
M. Escriot.

"West Australia. He will do right now. I am afraid he isgoing, and he has

M. Escriot shook his head. Nothing could be done with these English, they were such fools. Akers had been twice imprisoned for starving and beating his children, and here was his son and heir crying over the loss of an excellent parent!

Yes it is so. A few pence and a few kind words, now and then, will, in an English or American boy's heart, atone for months and years of crueity and neglect. As for the French, we have nothing to say. Their piety (in the old Latin sense) toward their fathers is more like a craze than anything else.

It was late into the night before M. Escriot had done with Akers. The man was dying, and wished to make a clean breast of it. To make a long story short, he entirely exonerated Mrs. Durnford, and ultimately the Judge who had tried her allowed that there had been a miscarriage of justice. We rather anticipate here, because the course of the story carries us away with M. Escriot and young Akers.

"I am an absolutely innocent woman," she replied. "Your suspicions are natural, I allow, but they are unfounded. Make any inquiries about me that you like. You are not clever enough to see one thing: if I had wished to trace my son for any evil purpose, I should scarcely have acknowledged to you two gentlement that I had been a convict."

This was so indubitably true that the two managers looked at one another. Great Queen Street smiled and spoke. "Well, God deal with you as you deal with your soh when you have regained your influence over him."
