It is worth while to see the "colleens" making lace and to finger the fine and filmy products of their art, but it is much more worth while to hear Father O'Flangan prove how the revival of Irish industry is to set Ireland free. A young priest he is, soft and low of voice, clearcut of features as he is clear-cut of thought; a zealous priest, his deep eyes glowing with patriotic fervor. cut of features as he is clear-cut of thought; a zealous priest, his deep eyes glowing with patriotic fervor. He is entertaining when he explains the fairy patterns, the webs of shimmering gossamen he is eloquent when he tells how and why the devoted patriots for whom he speaks are reviving this and other Irish industries. He is frank to explain that the lace makers and the laces of the exhibit are but his means to an end—and that end is to get him a hearing wherever he goes on behalf of Ireland and the industrial revival that is to make Ireland first commercially and then governmentally independent. It is a simple plan, but all across this continent it has proved wonderfully effective.

The lace industry in Ireland is 60 years old, but in common with other Irish industries it has lauguished dunder the political conditions from their homes on Sumay and yet their attendance at that sacred function can scarcely be characterized as anything else than automatic.

They rush from their homes on Sumay morning, hurrying along as they day morning, hurrying along as they day morning, hurrying along as they day morning the distance, only to arrive at the church door as the congregation is rising for the reading of the Gospel.

to dull the ear in the mystic progress of the great sacrifice. It is so easy to yield to distractions so difficult to fix the soul on the wonderful mystery enacting. The little bell tinkles again—"Domine non sum dignus." A moment of suggested reverence almost forced from indifference by the piety and attention of the congregation. The people in the rear of the church take their cue from those before them, bow their heads and bless themselves. The last Gospel is spent in brushing the dust of kneeling from the clothing and the first rush toward the doors bears with it generally the doors bears with it generally the clothing and the first rush toward the doors bears with it generally the doors bears with it generally the doors bears with it generally the clothing and the first rush toward the doors bears with it generally the doors bears with it generally the clothing and the first rush toward the doors bears with it generally the doors bears with it generally the doors bears with it generally the clothing and the first rush toward the doors bears with it generally the object of the trade. The Lace Industry.

The Lace Industry.

The following article taken from the Spokesman Review of Spokame will be interesting to many who take an interest in the lace industry of Ireland;

Genuine Irish lassies—black haired and rosy checked, with sparkling blue yes and a laugh that brings the heather-covered fields vividly to mind—are going to make genuine Irish lace right here in Spokame. Not for all time, but just for a week, at the Crescent store, beginning Monday.

The three Irish maids and privated States to advertise themselves or their work. They are here create an interest in the industry that may make Ireland famous proportions of their work the wind the father who are coming to Spokame and of the importance of their work the will be one of interest to all whose the lacemakers and their produce. The girls are in charge of the company of each of the price asked for them her amazement was the price asked in Ireland. It does not cost much to buy a needle and a laugh that brings the bright Irish girl to produce an article that can not be duplicated anywhere in the world.

As an example of the prices obtained in this country for these famous laces it may be stated that a lacket made of heavy frish crochet is valued at $45. It takes long to the tire girls and the father who are coming to Spokane and of the importance of their work the week week well be one of interest to all whose the lacemakers and their produce one of these pieces of intricate and difficult handiwork, and when it is considered that every look of the company of the conduct of its business.
