THE PANGS OF REMORSE
— OR —
A COMPLICATED TANGLE.

CHAPTER III.

The tutor fellow gone, Mr. Besant, on the floor, her hair all flowing with the wisdom that was to be expected of him, commenced to urge his

He said that he was sure that Lillian would come to her senses now that the fellow had gone for good, and—

Stopping in the troubled pacing to and fro, he turned the agitated face full upon the smooth fronting one.

"Harry, for Heaven's sake leave me! I can say nothing to-night. I can scarcely think. I cannot answer for anything that may occur. I do not even know how much has occurred already. He—he looked true, however false, he may have been, and—there, go, leave me to-night alone."

Mr. Besant, thinking it prudent to obey, shook his hand with unctuous sympathy and departed, clattering over the courtyard stones as noisily as usual.

Sir Ralph, after pacing the room for another quarter of an hour, rang the bell.

"Ask Miss Melville if she can come to me," he said, and the footman retired.

Presently Miss Lucas opened the door, stealthily.

"You sent for Lillian, Sir Ralph?" she said.

And Sir Ralph, too much agitated to be courteous, said:

"Where is she?"

"In her own room, very unwell, I fear," said Miss Lucas, with her slow monotony.

Sir Ralph trembled for a moment.

"Tell her, please, I should like to see her, and will come up."

Miss Lucas retired with the message and Sir Ralph, forgetting that he had sent her, followed a moment afterwards, so that he entered Lillian's room at the governess's heels.

A strange sight met his view.

His daughter, his beautiful, proud, self-possessed daughter, was sitting

"Oh, why did you not tell me? Vile as he is, I—I could not have—"

Lillian broke in passionately.

"Papa, are you mad? Vile! He is the soul of honor. Why did I not tell you? Because he himself made me promise that I would not. He knows why, but for some good reason, I am sure. Vile! Ah, who should know better than I how noble—how kingly he is!"

"He tried to rob me of you, Lillian, to steal your love, to—"

"It is false, whoever told you so!" cried the girl, her eyes flashing and her hands clinched. "False! false! He? It is he who has kept me true to you; he who has repelled—with sternness—the slightest advance I made. For—no shame now when he has suffered so much—I loved him weeks ago. I know it now—I know it now; blind I was not to have known it then. I knew it the moment I saw him spring upon the horse, for I felt at that moment more for him than myself—and that was love! And now—now you call him vile, and you have sent him away. What was that upon his face?" she added, turning upon him abruptly, almost savagely.

"What was it? Harry Besant was with you; he was coward enough to strike him, while you were there to help, and the poor fellow was weak—weak!"

Her voice died away almost in tenderness at the last words, but it revived fiercely, with all the Melville fierceness, as she continued:

"But, no matter. If he struck him, my hero will pay him back, measure; he will take no man's blow. Cowardly villain, to strike him—strike him!"

Her hands went above her head in a frenzy of passion at the thought.

Sir Ralph groaned, and something in the groan sounded so self-reproachful that the girl dropped her arms and looked at him. Her face blanched and she staggered.

"Father!"—It was the first time she had ever used the word—"you—you did not strike him?"

He could not reply, and she read his silence aright.

"Oh, shame! shame!" she wailed, dropping to the ground again and putting up her hand again to keep him off.

"He saved my life, and—you—struck him!"

Sir Ralph uttered a cry for help and sprang forward, for, with the last word, the overstrained strength gave way, and the beautiful head, covered by its wealth of hair, fell back heavy and lifeless.

Possibly the reader may share in Mr. Clifford's wonderment as to where Mr. Besant had obtained the materials of his really clever articles of accusation. If Mr. Besant himself had been asked, he could not have told.

The morning after his refusal to Lillian he had stamped home in a fearful temper, vowing vengeance against everyone and Lillian's lover, if he could discover him, in particular.

But how to discover whom she had the good taste to prefer to him, the lord and master of the Towers, he could not decide. Spying was quite out of his way; he did not lack the spirit, but he was entirely deficient in all the qualities requisite in a good dogging spy.

He asked his mother if she knew of anyone who was likely to have put his nose out of joint, as he phrased it, but beyond an illusion to the dear alderman as a man who could have told him, if he had lived, Lady Besant did not assist, and Mr. Harry Besant at last concluded that he must wait his chance.

He had not to wait long. The next morning a boy used by the Towers' servants to run surreptitious errands and do dirty and sly work generally, came sneaking up to Mr. Besant through the stable entrance and thrust a letter in his hand.

Mr. Besant good-naturedly gave him a cut with his whip, and, after he had glanced at the letter, sixpence, and a promise of another if he would disclose from whom he had received the letter. But the boy was either ignorant of its origin or told a falsehood admirably. He said that some one had stood behind the hedge in the green walk of the common and called him. When he had run up to the spot the some one had told him to stop and turn his back. He did so, and the some one handed him the letter over the hedge, which he received by extending his hand over his shoulder, and told him to take it to Mr. Besant's at the Towers, and deliver it 'on the quiet.' (To be continued.)

LONG LIFE.
The span of life increases, the learned physicians cry, and voters and their nices are not so apt to die; for Science, health's defender has made old illness surrender, some triumph, in its splendour, each morning greets the eye. The future generations will live two hundred years, as from the happy nations the microbe disappears; fair Science daily seizes a bunch of dread diseases, from them the life she squeezes, and lays them on their biers. She says, in language weighty, strange things will soon be seen, when sprightly lads of eighty will gambol on the green, and girls of ninety summers will vamp the village plumbers—such prophecies are hummers, and will come true, I ween. But there's the Book that teaches this lesson to all men, that one is through who reaches his three-score years and ten; he may hang on a little and sit around and whittle, with aching bones and brittle, but he's a relic then. This long established limit will doubtless always hold, though dogs may try to trim it, or stretch it manifold; we'll live the term accorded, with noble aims or sordid, and then we'll be rewarded with sleep as good as gold. Why should we wish to tarry when rest is what we need? Why should we ask to carry our burdens till we bleed? To see old things paraded when all their bloom is faded, and we are stale and jaded, from all illusions free?

Pains and Headaches Relieved by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Dublin, Ontario.—"I was weak and irregular, with pains and headaches, and could not sleep nights. I learned about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound by reading the letters in the newspapers and tried it because I wanted to get better. I have got good results from it as I feel a lot stronger and am not troubled with such bad headaches as I used to be and am more regular. I am gaining in weight all the time and I tell my friends what kind of medicine I am taking. You may use my letter as a help to others."—MRS. JAMES RACHO, Box 12, Dublin, Ontario.
