Before dinner he played simultaneously 16 of the best local players and beat them all, and after dinner he had another series of simultaneous games without seeing the boards. Of these he won seven, lost four, and drew five. He may at other times have made better scores, but his performance was still marvelous, both as a feat of memory and as an exhibition of skill.

The evening began with the "blindfold" games. Sixteen tables were arranged in horseshee shape, within which Pillsbury sat with his back to the room, gazing out of a window, smoking a cigar and sipping glass of water. The moves of the simulations of the some part of
