TORONTO WORLD.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 14, 1884.

A LITTLE TRICK.

"I was finishing," said Dr. H— to me, my fourth year of internal service at Hospital Saint-Louis. My studies had been brilliant, but I do not make myself a merit of that. I had kept aloof from all the alluring pleasures of the young people of my age for the double reason that I was deeply in love and that my love was not returned.

"I had refrained from casting my eyes on the grisettes of the Quartier-Latin, because I was desperately smitten with my handsome cousin, Henriette B—. and I toiled like a slave to escape from the disdain which the young lady's disdain of my love plunged me.

"Her father, my uncle, Dr. B—, who lived in a town of the west, would have been happy to have me for his son-in-law; the fact that we followed the same profession and saw science and everything else from the same point of view and sincerely attached him to me.

"His daughter being very young when I had commenced the serious side of my medical studies, I had maintained an absolute reserve toward her, though my care, my attentions, my emotions at my arrival and at my departure, were certainly visible enough to be noticed by a girl of 15, of intellectual development beyond her years.

"Meanwhile I was falling deeper and deeper in love with her, but, alas! the more I cared for her the less the cruel charmer cared for me. Hence it happened that the preceding year, a little before returning to Paris after five days' vacation passed at my uncle's house, the latter remarking my frightful sadness questioned me in regard to it.

"I plainly told him what was the matter.

"'Have you spoken to her of your love?' he asked of me.

"'Never, uncle; but a girl of 18 divines such things, and if she refuses to notice the attentions of a friend of her infancy it is with the aim of preventing him from making an avowal of his love.'

"'Quite probable. I must make a closer study of the case.'

"'Do you think that she loves another, uncle?'

"'Unfortunately, no. I am afraid of something else. Leave the matter entirely to me.'

"The 'unfortunately no' of Doctor B— was like a flash of cold water over me. I received the explanation of it a few months later.

"My uncle arrived in Paris one fine day. He looked fully ten years older than he really was; such also was the case with me. This is what he told me:

"'You know that my poor wife passed her too short existence in groaning over my incredulity. I am not a church member, but I am tolerant; I allowed her to devote herself to her piety and to bring up her daughter as she liked. When the poor, dear creature died Henriette was 14; she made me swear never to try to turn her child from her faith. I kept my oath, and thus little by little a wall of separation arose between me and my daughter.

"'A few days ago I resolved to auscultate this indecipherable nature. I spoke to her of the approaching moment when she would marry, and informed her of a dead that had been made upon me for her dowry. I took good care not to bring you into play, preferring to leave you as a recollection of romance, for all is romance in girls' heads.'

"'Well?' exclaimed I, anxiously.

"'Well, my poor friend, she coldly but decidedly declared to me that she had long been on the resolution to enter a convent.

"'I nearly fell backwards.

"'This is terrible!' I cried. 'And what answer did you make?'

"'Yes, it is terrible; and more so for a father than a lover. The lover can find another love, but the father cannot find another daughter. I declared to her that as long as the law gave me power over her it should not be.'

"'And then?'

"'And then she replied quite coldly and with a smile of beautitude that she was already aware of this, and would await the day of her majority!'

"'It's all over with me, uncle! As soon as possible I will request to be examined and demand permission to enter the corps of marine physicians.'

"'My friend, that would be stupid. There is yet another card to play.'

"'Just so. If you had understood sooner matters would be quite different with us now.'

"'Explain yourself.'

"'Listen to me, then. It is strange—for a father—what I am going to propose to you, but I have not the choice of means. When I set out she asked me what called me to Paris. Although I felt no inclination whatever to do so, I burst out laughing as I replied that I was going to see her foolish cousin, adding the enquiry if you were not thinking of demanding her hand.'

"She uttered a sigh and said:

"'The poor fellow! he has loved me for a long time.'

"'He!' I replied. 'Ah! my poor child, I now bless the ideas that have prevented you from listening to him—a sad dog, who is leading a less life in Paris!'

"'You said that to her, uncle?'

"'Word for word; it is part of my plan.' She started at me with as much stupefaction as could appear upon her countenance; then she murmured:

"'That's strange—such brilliant studies—such a modest bearing!'

"'Yes,' I responded; 'his bearing—a comedy for country use, and as to his brilliant studies, he is one of those diabolically gifted persons who rush to excess in toil as well as in riot.'

"'I left her thoughtful under the impression. Now, listen. You must cast off those old doctor's clothes in which you have thrust yourself and order some new ones suitable to a dashing young man and of the latest style. You must shave off your beard and leave only your moustache. You are a very good-looking young man, my friend, and that is fortunate for us. You are adroit in bodily exercise. You must cast aside your studies and arrive at my house within a week. You must surpass the utmost extravagance of our jeunesse dorce. You must hiss a few actors at the theater, and you will not find motives lacking. You will ride on horseback. If you can get into a duel with an officer of the garrison, so much the better, even if you should receive a severe wound. You must court Henrietta like a sous lieutenant of hussars, and in face of my opposition squarely propose to carry her off.'

"My uncle's program was faithfully executed. The fourth evening after my arrival I overwhelmed with hisses the popular prima donna, which caused me to be challenged by a young captain of the lancers. To top off my good fortune I gave him a sword cut instead of receiving one myself. After all this my uncle declared before his daughter that I was compromising his house, and must go lodge at the hotel.

"As to Henriette, she was radiant, and after some little hesitation had consented to the elopement. There was no need of postchaises, for the railway station was at the foot of the garden. We were to go on the 1 a.m. train on Thursday. It was then Monday.

"'But have you any money?' asked Henriette of me.

"'I have yet 3000 francs,' I replied. My uncle had given them to me the previous day.

"'You bad fellow!' said she, lowering her eyes. 'You will get into some quarrel or adventure and lose them. Trust them to me; they will then be safer than in your pocket.'

"Everything was getting along splendidly.

"As was understood, I remained for two days without appearing at the house.

"On Wednesday I awaited the stroke of midnight and stole furtively into the garden by the back gate. Not a glimmer of light at Henriette's window. I imitated the crying of a night bird, the signal agreed upon; but nothing stirred. I removed my shoes, made my way into the mansion and ascended to her chamber, at the door of which I knocked discreetly. Not a sound, I entered. The chamber was empty.

"I waited until 1 o'clock. The train passed. The elopement had failed. Where was Henriette? I rushed into my uncle's apartment utterly overwhelmed.

"'What! you here?' he exclaimed. 'I thought you en route since 10.35.'

"'Since 10.35!'

"'Yes, I heard all the preparations that were made at 10 o'clock!'

"'But, uncle, then——'

"'What then?'

"'Henriette must have eloped with some one else!'

"We subsequently learned that my handsome cousin, with a true woman's wit, had plotted as deeply on her side as we had on ours. She had impressed into her service the vicar of the parish, her confessor, who, aided by two subordinate priests, had assisted the fair schemer to escape and find refuge in the convent of her choice, taking with her my 5000 francs.

"My uncle never forgave his daughter, and as for me I still love her so much that I have determined to live a bachelor for the rest of my days."
