COMMITTEE REPORTS

COMMITTEE I—DEFENCE AND
FOREIGN POLICY

The Present Situation in Panama

The present crisis in the relations between the U.S. and Panama was discussed as part of the larger problem of the hemispheric relations of Canada and the U.S. The maintenance of active control by the U.S. over the Panama canal, including the preservation of the security of the canal, was justified by U.S. delegates as vital not only to the defence of this hemisphere but also for the commerce of all maritime countries that have access to its facilities upon the payment of uniform and modest tolls. In this connection, it was pointed out that Latin American countries in particular rely on the canal for their participation in world trade.

Several U.S. delegates explained the genesis of the present crisis. The flag issue was only a symptom of more basic issues. Among the reasons advanced for the crisis were the economic disparity between the loving conditions of U.S. and Panamanians working in the canal zone, a growing nationalist sensitivity in Panama, approaching elections in that country in which candidates use the presence of Americans as a campaign issue, and communist-inspired activities.
