When we speak of substituting soft food or semi-solids for bottle meals, the question naturally arises, what are the soft foods that may be given? The first thing we give the baby is usually a piece of zwieback. This is a piece of hard bread, dried out in the oven. There must be no soft centre, just hard crust all the way thru. Cracker teething rings are good, but ather expensive when a crust and Cracker teething rings are good, but rather expensive when a crust answers the purpose. Every baby loves a bone, and should occasionally have one to suck. Scrape off all the meat and gristle and let him bite away. To introduce baby to semi-solids, farina is a good cereal. I have given the recipe before, but will repeat it. Take one tablespoonful of farina and sprinkle it gradually into four ounces of milk and four ounces of water, boiling together. Add a pinch of salt, stir well and cook in a double boiler for an hour. Give the baby one tablespoonful of the food with his 10 o'clock feeding. Serve it with top-milk. The spoonful of the food with his 10 o'clock feeding. Serve it with top-milk. The rest of that meal is made up of the regular formula. When making farina be careful to keep it from lumping. If it is sprinkled into the boiling milk and water and stirred constantly it should be quite smooth.

At the 2 o'clock meal give half a jellied egg or three ounces of mutton broth. Crumble dried bread crumbs in the egg and broth.

WO classes of women bake their own bread. One class does it to save money and the other to have a finer article. Both will attain the same result, for home-made bread is better and more economical than the professional baker's article.

The best bread to make at home for all purposes is cream or milk bread, for it is richer than bread mixed with water only. It is not so white as water bread, nor is it so finely grained, but it is better flavored and keeps moist longer than any other. One of the important things to have right when making bread is the bread pan, for the dough may be well made and as light and sweet as possible, and still be ruined in the baking. Sheet iron pans of heaviest material are well liked because they hold the heat well, distribute it evenly and prevent the bread burning in the
