IT is evident, that Dr. Shebbeare's account of the character and administration of King William, is full of the groffeft misrepresentations; but if it were just, it would only prove, that too much confidence ought not to be placed in princes; and that, by whom foever the throne may be filled, the people ought to guard with the utmost vigilance and caution against regal encroachments. Perhaps few princes have exercifed their authority with more upright views than King William: but the hiftory of mankind affords too many infances of princes and others, who have derived their power folely from the free choice of the people, and who yet, with the utmost wickedness and ingratitude, have betrayed the truft reposed in them, and totally difregarded the interefts of those to whom they owed their elevation.

As to the Doctor's parallel between King William and his prefent Majesty, I shall only observe, that it is in general very fife to libel dead Kings, and it may be profitable
