

LITERARY MEMORIES.

The happy, happy summer time,
How far off now it seems!
Those rambles on the seavirt shore,
Appear but brief, bright dreams.

Are they but dreams, those memories?
Can dreams thus change the life,
Once tranquil as the Summer sea,
Now wintry stormy strife?

'Tis then and now, can only weeks
In such long shadows fall?
Weeks!—And the fingers of one's hand
Suffice to count them all!

But he, the sharer of that dream,
What has it been to him?
A dream indeed—the memory
Already very dim.

He little thought, he little thinks
What that time was to me;
To him they were but idle hours,
Passed rather pleasantly.

To me! Oh where can words be found
Sufficient to express
The rapture of that blissful time,
Is more than happiness?

He'd smile—Yes men can always smile
At love so quickly won—
And say, as easy to replace,
If this now prized were gone.

With some it might. But oh, not so
Oh never so to me!
This shrine, its idol once destroy'd,
Is doom'd to vacancy.

Here, in my desk, some treasures lie,
Mementoes of those hours;
Some pebbles bright, a pearly shell,
A bunch of faded flowers.

Flowers; ah, he called me a flower
How pleased was I that day!
Alas! a flower's fate was mine—
Thrown heedlessly away!

Not so shall these my treasures be,
But kept with sacred care;
More valued they, more dearly prized
Than holy reliques are.

How is it that I love him thus,
While he indifferent prove?
Ah; men live in a busy world,
A woman's world's her love.
M. T. C.

Surely Not.

Continued.

Mrs St Leger never received company at her own house, as she said she could not afford it. She went out of course for the sake of the girls, and her grand ambition was to marry them off well. "Their few thousands," as she would remark confidentially to her friends, "will be sufficient to keep them from being a drag on their husbands if they marry, or dependent on their friends if they don't." In reality these few thousands represented about twelve hundred pounds each.

Augusta was her second daughter, and as she was the prettiest and cleverest, she hoped to make her "go off" brilliantly. Mrs St Leger's disappointment was therefore grievous when, towards the close of her first season, Augusta after declining some very suitable offers, showed a strong inclination to look with favorable eyes on Mr Egerton's proposal.

Now Augusta had, as Mrs St Leger thought, very heretical notions; and these were particularly strong on the subject of matrimony. She was an instance, not so very uncommon as some people fancy, of a nature not spoiled by a thorough skillful worldly training. In addition to this she was possessed of a certain amount of firmness or obstinacy, which made Mrs St Leger rather shy in trying to thwart her. She had experienced considerable difficulty in the case of Mr Egerton, and she was obliged to acknowledge to herself that she had not been quite so successful as she could have wished. Augusta had barely decided in her own mind what she ought to do, but she did not make her mother a confidant of her uncertainty.

Mr Egerton had made his first appearance in their circle that season. He had had good introductions and he speedily made his way. It was reported that he had good expectations from an uncle in the country, who had brought him up. Very little was known about him, with the exception that at his uncle was a man of very good family but eccentric habits. But in reality he was the son of a younger brother of his uncle, Mr Egerton of Bush Knoll, who married imprudently early in life. Both father and mother died young; and their only child Gilbert, was left to the sole care of his uncle. He had acted altogether the part of a kind guardian; and rightly judging that his heir [for he intended to leave him his property] should enter society, he sent him to London, first of all having procured for him good introductions. He made one great mistake however, and that was in allowing him only five hundred a-year. This might not have mattered so much had not it been for a friend of Egerton's, one with whom he was formerly very intimate, but of whom he knew but very little now.

Charles Fanshawe and Gilbert Egerton had been at school together, and while there, one of those friendships had sprung up which, are just as warm as they are short-lived. Their paths diverged widely after leaving school. Charles Fanshawe, who was two years Egerton's senior, entered general society in London almost immediately on quitting school. Egerton went to Oxford; and until they renewed their acquaintance in London, they had not seen or heard anything of each other for five or six years. Every one knows how great a change may come over a man's character and habits, more particular if he be young, in half-a-dozen years. Such was the case in this instance. While Egerton was improved, Fanshawe's nature was all but debased. Unhappy in the choice of his associates, he had been led on until he contracted their vices; and young as he was, his name had already been mixed up with some transactions by no means creditable to him or any one else. Of this, Egerton of course knew nothing, and he had no friend to caution him. Although he saw things he could not but disapprove of, he had as yet seen nothing that would warrant his breaking off an acquaintance that still retained some of the charm it possessed in the old school days.

The season was not very far advanced before Gilbert found that his allowance must be increased, or that it would be necessary for him to leave London earlier than he had intended. It may be asked how he had reconciled with his sense of honour to a young girl, when he knew that his circumstances far from being affluent now, were still more uncertain for the future. Before writing to Augusta, he had unintentionally let words fall which would have required some kind of explanation, even if he had not avowed the feelings that prompted them; and in his letter he had candidly stated his position and prospects, earnestly entreating her not to decide in haste, but to wait a month before replying, if she preferred delay. This letter Augusta never showed her mother, otherwise Mrs St. Leger would have had additional cause for arguing against the match.

Mrs St Leger and her daughter remained silent for a few moments, and Augusta had just risen to leave the room, when Mrs Arthur Riggleton was announced. The last-mentioned lady was no favorite of Augusta's, but quite Mrs St Leger's bosom friend, the confidant of all her little annoyances and troubles, the person to whom she breathed (in strict confidence, of course), all the plans she was in the habit of forming, using her as a kind of safety valve.
