THE GREAT CRISIS.

The death of Sir John A. Macdonald will not be an unmixed evil to Canada. It has consolidated the national sentiment during the past few weeks as probably no other event could have done. It has united our people in a sympathy and sorrow which were national. The public heart has alternately thrilled with pride and grief at the death of Canada's greatest public man. Grief that death had claimed him for its own, pride that the world had claimed him for its citizen. In the vast chorus of tribute that has swelled from ocean to ocean during these eventful days there has been no discordant sound. His bitterest foes have extended towards the departed leader no less loyal a tribute of sympathy than his warmest friends. As from other lands have come pulsations beneath the seas the words of praise and appreciation, Canada has felt proud that he was a Canadian.

There can be little doubt that America has produced no greater politician than Sir John Macdonald. He was a born leader of men. His sagacity was recognized by the highest as well as the humblest of his followers. He recognized also his own high gifts and was ready to make any sacrifice at his bidding. Recalling the critical periods through which his administration has passed, the skill with which he controlled events and rallied his forces on the verge of disaster, seem almost more than human. It has been remarked that, however a man may be vilified and traduced, there will somehow filter through the mass of falsehood and into the minds of men a conviction of the truth. Thus it was with the great Napoleon who, though he was vilified by the British mind as the vilest of monsters, was, nevertheless, understood as thoroughly in England as in France, and his great and noble qualities as generally recognized. Thus it was and is with Sir John Macdonald. He was not a perfect character. True greatness is seldom found to be. Of all the arts of the politician he was the master and he utilized them. He cannot be held guiltless of the charge of maintaining himself in power by corruption and extravagance. Perhaps, to say this, is but to say that he was human, or that the end justified the means, or indeed to say that public life in Canada was his sphere of action.

But, however, these things be the world recognizes that Sir John Macdonald was one of the very foremost men of his nation and of his age. Every true Canadian must feel the glow of patriotism within him as he reads what is said of the dead chief by other pens and other tongues than ours. His loyalty to his country, his unswerving devotion to Canadian unity under the aegis of the British flag, his courage, his hopefulness and his ardor are the admiration of other nations than our own.

Whether Sir John was as great a future man as he was a politician only the future can determine. The test of statesmanship is results. The immediate results of the aims and energies of Sir John Macdonald's life may be analyzed, but the ultimate results can not now be determined or ascertained. Should harmony be preserved among the discordant elements which he has brought together; should national unity be maintained; should the principles which he advocated, his claim as being one of the greatest of modern statesmen can not be successfully disputed. Should the aims which he advanced be repudiated by the nation; should it be found that he has bequeathed to Canada a legacy of corruption, a burden of debt and a legal system which shall eventually prove ruinous to our welfare, posterity will declare that though he was one of the greatest of political leaders he was not a great nor a wise statesman.

It is admitted by the government press, as well as declared by the opposition, that the crisis with which the conservative party is brought face to face is one of peculiar gravity. The issue is not the premier of Canada he can never fill the shoes of Sir John Macdonald. The outlook at present is that no leader can be selected on whom all factions will cordially unite.

FOR THE POLE.
No less than five expeditions are starting this summer for the discovery of the north pole, while one only will make an endeavor to solve the mystery of the south pole. The accepted theory is that there is an open sea at the north, and a continent at the south pole, but there is really very little actual geographical knowledge on the subject. Of the five expeditions to the north, that of Lieut. Peary, U. S. A., seems to be planned with the greatest possible chance of success. It is doubtful, however, whether it will succeed. In the end, however, the discovery of the pole will be made by pushing forward a series of posts, one taking the place of the other as the advance is made from the base of supplies. In this way constant communication could be kept up, and the goal arrived at by a systematic push forward on a carefully devised plan. Isolated expeditions, making a dash at the pole now and again, have to encounter many elements of failure with few chances of success.—Star.

DISGRACEFUL.
The bacarat trial in England, on which for more than a week the attention of Europe and America was centered, resulted in the discomfiture of the plaintiff, Sir William Gordon Cumming, whose disgrace is thus by his own wantonly failing in provoking a trial, much deeper than ever. Those who think the event will prove a warning to the aristocracy of Britain are doubtless mistaken. The privileged classes in that country have born the burden of too many scandals and crimes during the past few years to be seriously disturbed by anything of this kind. At the same time the popular indignation created by these revelations of English high life cannot but hasten the rise of the tide of democracy in that country. It is safe to say that the upper grades of society in the mother land never presented a more humiliating spectacle in the eyes of the world than at the present.

R. A. PAYNE, of the St. John Sun, has had the sole responsibility of the editorial columns of the paper upon his shoulders lately. Mr. Scott having been at Ottawa attending the session. The genial Robert is a fine all-round newspaper writer and his work on the Sun has been of a superior order.

GETTYSBURG AND WATERLOO.

The question of which was the greater battle, Gettysburg or Waterloo, is seriously discussed in the Century for June by Theodore Roosevelt. There are few persons in existence who would concede the thought of comparing the two battles at all, and for his originality in this respect Mr. Roosevelt is entitled to some credit. The writer computes that at Gettysburg there were present in action 80,000 to 85,000 union troops and of the confederates some 35,000. At Waterloo he claims that there were 120,000 soldiers of the allies under Wellington and Blucher, and 72,000 under Napoleon. In each case, says the writer, the weaker army made the attack and was defeated only, he argues, Lee did not have to face such heavy odds as Napoleon.

Mr. Roosevelt evidently knows more about writing for magazines than he does of military matters. There was no such disparity of force at Waterloo as he represents. While Blucher's Prussians numbered over 50,000, not over a third of them ever fired a shot until the French left the field, and that third was held in check by ten thousand men under Lobau until Ney's last disastrous charge was made. This left Napoleon with 62,000 men, even according to Mr. Roosevelt, to wage the real fight of the day with Wellington's 68,000 British, Germans and Dutch Belgians. But this is not all, for the 17,000 Dutch Belgians were a source of weakness rather than strength, and almost ruined the defence of the allies by their cowardice and disorderly flight. With few exceptions they rendered no service in the battle, and Wellington's chances would have been better had they never been there at all. The whole brunt of the struggle fell upon less than 50,000 British and Germans who, up to three o'clock in the afternoon, when Bulow's advanced battalions made their appearance on the right of the French, resisted all the energies of Napoleon's united force. Napoleon had as good a chance to secure the aid of Grouchy and his 35,000 men as Wellington had to secure that of Blucher with his 50,000 Prussians. But the fact was that Napoleon made little or no effort to recall Grouchy while Wellington's understanding with Blucher was complete. Neither does Mr. Roosevelt take into consideration the superior weight of Napoleon's artillery which maintained its ascendancy at every stage of the battle. The real misfortune of Napoleon at Waterloo as of Ney at Quatre Bras was that he was outgeneraled by events.

Mr. Roosevelt's effort to show that Gettysburg was the bloodier battle of the two is also unavailing. He places the confederate loss at 15,500, and the northern loss at 17,555, while at Waterloo the British and French lost 25,000 or 30,000. The French loss is generally estimated at above these figures. It is also to be borne in mind that Gettysburg was a series of struggles extending over three days and covering an immense extent of ground. Like most of the fighting in the war between the north and the south it was of a very amateurish kind. It would be just as logical to include as part of the battle of Waterloo the bloody engagements at Ligny and Quatre Bras, as to call all the skirmishes that took place before the final movement at Gettysburg the battle of Gettysburg.

But in making any comparison between the two battles the results must be considered. Gettysburg only stopped the advance of Lee into Pennsylvania; Waterloo obliterated Napoleon, diverted the stream of history, and changed the geographical face of all Europe. Lee was simply repulsed; Napoleon and all his fortunes were annihilated.

HERO WORSHIP.

All nations are more or less addicted to hero worship. And there is no hero like the dead he will be lauded to the skies and will be discovered to possess powers of mind and virtues of heart, the existence of which, during his lifetime, was never suspected. Especially will this be the case if he is a socially correct sort of hero. He need not be a moral hero, but if he would receive the full measure of homage due from his natural subjects, he should be able to name his grandfather after he (the hero) is dead. In the case of Sir John Macdonald, it is not clear that he can leave the name behind him in a conspicuous place for easy reference.

There is no country except France where hero worship has attained the magnitude that it now exhibits in America. The people of the United States, while sharp and enterprising in all the commercial relations of life, are vain and boastful to a degree. With them hero worship is the high religion. What Blaine has ever been in his short life should envelop the continent heaven only knows. He is doubtless an able politician but as a legislator he has done nothing for which future generations will remember him. So infinitesimal a hero as President Harrison has his worshippers, and with him may be numbered lesser gods without number.

There is no illusion hugged so fondly to the breast of the hero-worshipper as that the nation is deluged with tears when his favorite hero dies. Doubtless there are many who will regret the event, but there are few who will really sorrow over the death of anyone. An eminent man may fill a large space in the minds of men; he will seldom occupy much room in their hearts. The departed will be referred to with every form of respect because it is good form to do so. But the nation will manage to keep in check the scalding torrents of woe and follow with marked resignation its old pursuit—the chase of the mighty dollar. Perhaps, after all, we have enough private griefs and woes without indulging unduly in public ones.

Let it not be thought that these remarks are directed to recent events in Canada. They have no local application, though, probably, they are as applicable to Canada as elsewhere. We are wont, like our neighbors to the south of us, to boil over and effervesce now and then beyond the confines of reason.

The three great issues upon which Prof. Briggs, whose case has so greatly excited the Presbyterian world, has been tried and found guilty, are: 1st. He assumes that the three great fountains of divine authority are the Bible, the church and reason. 2d. That there are errors in the scriptures that no one has been able to explain away, and the theory that they are not in the original text is sheer assumption upon which no mind can rest with certainty. 3d. That there is no authority in the scriptures or in the creeds of Christendom for the doctrine of immediate sanctification and death, and that the only sanctification known to experience, to christian orthodoxy, and to the Bible is progressive sanctification.

DISAPPOINTED.—Post office square is in a disgraceful condition. The crop of dandelions, however, will be large.

A MODERN SCOURGE.

One of the pests of the age is quack advertising. And one of the most obnoxious forms in which this species of advertising is done, is that by which the reader is fooled into reading what purports to be a genuine news article or item, only to find it leading up to some freckle lotion, or corn alleviator at the end. It may be questioned whether much is accomplished by this kind of advertising. It seems unreasonable to suppose that the person who is filled with disgust at the trick thus played upon him, will be filled with much enthusiasm for investing in the article so thrust upon his notice. It may be, however, that quack advertisers are good judges of human nature. They doubtless consider that the painful impression referred to is but temporary, while the knowledge gained by the victim of the existence and virtues of the freckle lotion is permanent.

We have seldom seen the precocity of the quack advertiser exhibited in such defiance of the ordinary rules of decency as in a recent issue of the Toronto World. The World is a good conservative paper. Yet while the premier lay struggling with the last enemy at Eadsfield, and the world watched his demise, this precious effusion was appearing from day to day in the World.

THE CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT.

Should death rob Canada of her able and popular premier, many changes would take place in the cabinet. Whether Sir Charles or Sir John takes the helm the people and business of the dominion will be disturbed for a time. Canadians, however, have the satisfaction of knowing that they have in magnetic and wonder-working Sir John a man who, while writing compound articles that do not change from being the best and most effective for household use. Try them.

THE POWER OF BRITAIN.

Few people have a correct idea of the overwhelming greatness of the British Empire. No power of which there is a record, either in ancient or modern times, equalled it in extent of territory or number of population. The Chinese empire only is set down as having a larger gross population than the British empire, but Chinese statistics are notoriously unreliable. Last February the census of India was taken, and the returns have been published. They show, says the Star, the population at that time to have been, in round numbers, two hundred and twenty millions five hundred thousand. The gain of about twenty-two millions in ten years. But to this must be added the population of the federatory states under British protection, numbering sixty-five millions of people, which establishes the stupendous aggregate of two hundred and eighty-five millions. Thus, as expressed in India alone, Queen Victoria reigns over a population twice as large as that under the sway of the Czar of all the Russias. The population of the entire British Empire is set down by statisticians at three hundred and thirty millions or fifty-two millions less than that claimed by China, and about five times as large as that of the United States. These figures are bewildering in their magnitude. They include men of all races and states of civilization and savagery, and when we think of how all are ruled with comparative peacefulness, the spectacle, from an historical point of view, is one of the grandest ever presented to the human mind.

THE LAST RITES.

The funeral of Sir John at Ottawa on Wednesday when the remains were borne to the railway station at Rideau Falls, Kingston, where they were buried on Thursday, was the grandest ever seen in Canada. Every branch of the public service of Canada was represented and the cortege was a most imposing one. It has been suggested that the late Sir John should be given a resting place in Westminster abbey, amid the illustrious dead of Britain. The suggestion is the proper resting place for the great chief and here he shall remain.

Yesterday a grand memorial service was held in Westminster abbey in honor of Sir John, thus showing what repute the premier held away official classes in England. All the Imperial, Cabinet ministers and members of Parliament are to attend were present together with many Canadians and other colonists at present in London. The service no doubt was very grand and impressive. Lord Salisbury paid a most gratifying tribute to Sir John in the house of Lords this week. In the course of his remarks Lord Salisbury said Sir John Macdonald was as great a constitutional statesman as any nation had ever seen. Other members of the house of lords followed in eulogies of the dead premier.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

St. Stephen is excited over the discovery of valuable nickel mines in the vicinity. There is some excitement among the colonists. The nickel in the vicinity has gone up in value with a bound.

PROTECTING THE SEALS.

The United States Government Preparing to Enforce the Close Season.
WASHINGTON, June 11.—The government is actively preparing to carry out the plan for a close season in Behring Sea this year. It is understood that the force of revenue cutters now in those waters is to be supplemented by one or more naval vessels at the earliest possible moment. The necessary orders had not been sent out from the navy department up to the close of business hours to-day and the detailed officers will not discuss the future movements of the department, but there is reason to believe the orders will not be long delayed. The British government, it is known, wishes the agreement to be strictly observed. A proposition was made by Sir Julian Pauncefote that the authority be given the British government to station an agent on the seal islands to make sure that the North American commercial company does not kill more than the 7500 seals fixed in the agreement, but on this ground their request was promptly denied by the president, who felt it was a reflection upon the good faith of this government and could not be permitted. For another reason, however, he saw fit to allow the British agent to visit the seal islands, and that was that he might see for himself and report to his government for its guidance in the arbitration of the actual state of the seal fisheries. By the agreement to maintain a close season the United States suffers a loss of more than half a million dollars, which would be the revenue if the full number of sealskins were to be taken this year by the Commercial company. This company also suffers through the suspension, and meanwhile the poachers are believed to be taken large numbers of skins and killing the mother seals while they are in search of food.

A WOMAN SHEDDING HER BONES.

North Carolina Doctors Puzzled by a Curious Case.
One of the most remarkable cases ever brought before the medical fraternity of the state, is that of Mrs. Sarah Neas, who lives just beyond Ashland, N. C.

Dr. T. E. Neas, a prominent physician, says that about twenty years ago Mrs. Neas scorched the end of her index finger while ironing, and on the evening of the same day cut the same finger with a piece of glass. After this excoriation began, first in the phalanges of the fingers, and as the disease progressed the forearm became involved. The excoriation takes place spontaneously. About ten minutes after it occurs the woman is seized with intense pains which continue until the bone is discharged. There is no hemorrhage or inflammation, and it always heals by first intention. No pus has ever formed in any wound from this disease, and what seems more remarkable in the case is that the bone seems to be immediately replaced by some process of ossification, which may be inferred from the fact that there is no disfigurement of the part from which the bone is expelled.

The bone does not always make its appearance on the surface immediately after breaking loose but occasionally one will be some hours moving down the arm. It moves an inch or so very rapidly and remains at that point some little time then moves on a little farther and continues in this way until it reaches the back of the hand, and makes its appearance on the surface. The bones from the inferior maxillary make their appearance on the surface near where they break loose.

Dr. Neas says that on one occasion he was called very hurriedly to see her. On his arrival he found a bone lodged in her throat. He removed the bone, and she told him she had swallowed two previous to his arrival, and while sitting talking to her a bone about one inch in length came from her left ear. The bones look natural, though some of them look as if they had been bleached.

The number of bones expelled up to this time is 528. No deformity can be detected. She has used nearly all good uses of her arm, but it is now impaired to some extent. She is the mother of one child, and is free from any disease that would have a tendency to produce softening of the brain. She has been a woman of good constitution, and has lived a long life. Her life has taken very little mercury.

Sir John's Favorite Poem.

The following poem by Rev. Father Ryan, the poet of the Confederate states, who is now dead, was the favorite poem of Sir John Macdonald:

My feet are weary and my hands are tired,
My soul oppressed—
And I desire, what I have long desired—
Rest—only rest.

'Tis hard to toll—when toll is almost vain,
In barren ways,
'Tis hard to sow—and never garner grain,
I die for rest.

The burden of my days is hard to bear,
But God knows best;
And I have prayed—but vain has been my prayer,
For rest—sweet rest.

'Tis hard to live—in spring and never reap
The autumn yield;
'Tis hard to till, and 'tis hard to weep
O'er fruitless field.

And so I cry, a weak and human cry,
So heart oppressed;
And so I sigh, a weak and human sigh,
For rest—for rest.

My way has wound across the desert years,
And cares infest
My path, and through the flowing of hot tears
I die for rest.

'Twas always so: when but a child I lay
On mother's breast
My weary little head; 'e'en then I prayed
As now—for rest.

And I am restless still; 'twill soon be o'er;
For, down the west
Life's sun is setting, and I see the shore
Where I shall rest.

THE MYSTERY UNVEILED.

Clara Wortman of Salisbury Ran Away in Male Attire.

A Moncton despatch of yesterday states that Clara Wortman, the missing Salisbury girl, has been found, but not in the woods. Between 200 and 300 men were tramping the woods around getting her over a week without getting the slightest trace of her, and lately several picnics have been around that she was not in the woods at all, but had run away from home. This proves correct, though it is said the girl had no reason for going away. It has been learned that a boy dressed in ill-fitting clothes stopped a few days ago at the house of Byron Freeze of Penobscot, a relative of the Wortman family. Mr. Freeze did not know at the time that Clara was missing, but since hearing of the fact, this suspicion was aroused. The boy's clothes and cap were made by the boy in regard to the Wortman family.

The clue was followed up and Clara was found working as a farm laborer on the farm of Byron McLeod, near Penobscot. She was wearing her brother's clothes and the name she gave was that of a hero of a story she took with her when she started for school on Monday of last week. It is supposed the girl's head was turned by reading trashy stories. There is great indignation among the hundreds of men who have been searching the woods for her, large parties having gone from Moncton, Petitcodiac and other places to assist the search of the district.

DARING NEW YORK BURGLARS.

New York, June 11.—The great dry goods store of Hutton, Hughes & Deming, formerly T. S. Stewart's, at the corner of Broadway and Ninth street, was robbed last Friday night. The plunder is said to have included all the diamonds in the jewelry department of the firm valued at $10,000. The burglars concealed themselves in the store during the day and were locked in at night. Four watchmen are employed by the firm, but they are all stationed outside of the building. The robbers easily forced open the safe and secured the booty. In order to get out of the iron and steel covered building the thieves started a fire in the basement under the sidewalk and then hid near the door upstairs and awaited developments. The smoke soon attracted the attention of the watchmen and the latter after turning in an alarm opened a little door in the steel shutter covering the Fourth avenue entrance and then rushed into the basement to extinguish the flames. The robbers escaped unnoticed. The fire was soon put out by the firemen and the store was again locked up. The robbery was discovered the next morning.

HAVOC TO LIFE AND PROPERTY.

St. Louis, Mo., June 10.—A special from Admore, I. T., says reports received here give heart rending accounts of the havoc to life and property in the over-flooded valleys of the Red river in Texas and the territory since Sunday. The river is higher than for years. Dwellings and business houses were swept away, crops destroyed, and stock of all kinds destroyed. The rush of waters was so rapid and unexpected but few had time to seek safety on higher lands. It is feared many people now missing were drowned. Many families were rendered homeless.

Barnum, was in his eighty-first year and a native of Sackville, N. B. In the city of St. Stephen he was principal of the high school, retaining the position for years after becoming totally blind.

Four or five years ago farmer George Hutchins of Anson, N. J., died, leaving $12,000 to disseminate the Henry George works. The heirs contested the will and the case has been carried through nearly all the courts in the state. The only reason it is not carried further seems to be because the estate is exhausted. The legatees has received $2,600 and there is only $3,18 left.

Great excitement prevails at Port-au-Prince, Hayti. Martial law has been declared and some 60 persons have been shot. President Hyppolite is said to hold full sway and to be ordering executions indiscriminately. A mob gathered the other day and released 200 prisoners. Hyppolite was for a time in fear of his life, but got his troops out and dispersed the mob, killing a number and arresting many.

It appears that Brazilian importers complain of abuse of the reciprocity agreement with the United States, by which merchandise shipped by other nations is cleared without duty as if shipped from the United States. It is stated the United States steamship Finance, from New York, recently landed at Bahia a hundred barrels of codfish from Halifax, which were entered as products of the United States and were admitted as such free of duty.

Barbara Waterhouse, aged five, a quarman's daughter, of Leeds, Eng., mysteriously disappeared from home last Saturday. At midnight Wednesday night the police discovered her body wrapped in a bundle lying in a street close to the town hall. The abdomen had been ripped open, the intestines protruded, and the legs and arms had been almost severed from the body and were covered with deep gashes. The child's clothes had evidently been replaced after the murder.

At the western entrance to Baddeck bay is Indian Point. The action of the sea on the Bras d'Or Lake has of late years washed away the bank to a large extent, and a few days ago part of the bank fell disclosing a coffin. Both the outside and inside coffins were so decayed that on being lifted they fell to pieces. There was nothing in the coffin to show that it was of one time the receptacle of the remains of a human being. Two other graves near by only wait time and the restless sea to share the same fate.—Sydney Herald.

Advices from Badia, Calabria and Tregunaro, two of the towns in Northern Italy visited by the earthquake Monday, show that the inhabitants are terror-stricken and that they have taken to the fields for safety. The authorities have endeavored as far as possible to alleviate the distress among the people. The subterranean rumblings continue and occasionally lighter shocks than those previously felt. The damage done at these two places is much greater than was indicated in the first reports. The towns were practically destroyed by the severity of the shocks.
