

Capture of an Old Reprobate.

Our telegraphic news to-day confirms the capture of that old monster in iniquity and cruelty, Nena Sahib, whose trial it is stated is to come off immediately.

Reference to this hated name brings up all the terrible and thrilling events connected with the Indian Mutiny in 1857, when by a gigantic revolt of the natives, the fall of our empire in the East was imperilled, and Britain's prestige put to the severest test it ever experienced.

The history of that fearful revolt will be fresh in the recollection of most of our readers, from its inception in January of that year, through all its harrowing details, till the following September, when it received its death-blow.

In connection with the capture of its leader, the following brief summary of the mutiny, as given by the Mail, will be read with fresh interest. "It may be remembered that the Indian mutiny was foreshadowed in January 23rd, 1857, at Dum Dum, by the expressed discontent of the Sepoy soldiers, who alleged that the cartridges furnished them were lubricated with a mixture of cows' and pigs' fat, by handling which their castes would be violated.

On the 6th of February an officer at Barrackpore was informed by a Sepoy of a plot formed in the regiment to rise and murder the officers. On the 25th instant, the 19th Native Infantry refused to receive the percussion caps issued to them, and at night they seized their rifles and ammunition; this revolt was, however, suppressed by the cavalry and artillery, and the disaffected corps was disbanded.

On the 8th April following, Mangal Pandey was executed at Barrackpore for insubordination. On the 10th May a mutiny of Sepoys occurred at Meerut, and the mutineers were driven into Delhi by the Europeans, where a fearful scene of carnage occurred, in which women and children were not spared.

On the 6th of June the massacre of British officers occurred at Allahabad, and by the end of the month twenty-two stations in the Bengal Presidency were in a state of open mutiny. On the 14th of June Sir Hugh Wheeler urgently requested aid from Lucknow from Sir Henry Lawrence, who died on the 4th July from the effect of a wound received from the bursting of a shell.

On the 11th of July the command of the troops in India was offered to Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde, who with military promptitude, left England on the following day for the scene of his duties. On the 15th July the massacre of Cawnpore, which aroused the indignation of the whole civilized world, took place. The garrison capitulated to Nana (or Nana) Sahib on his promise that their lives should be spared; but, while in the boats by which they were evacuating the city, they were treacherously fired upon and remorselessly slaughtered.

Within the city then ensued a frightful scene of rapine and murder, accompanied by most horrible outrages by the Sepoys on the persons of the European ladies whose sad fate it was to fall into their hands. The bodies of the violated women and of children who had been wantonly mutilated were then thrown into a well. The gallant General Havelock, at the head of brigade numerically weak indeed, but composed of men who might have fairly claimed to be les braves des braves entered Cawnpore on the 17th, when the atrocities referred to were fully realized for the first time, and, leaving General Neill in charge, he advanced to the relief of Lucknow, the anxious garrison of which city joyously witnessed the gleaming bayonets of his Highlanders on the 16th September.

Although the British Government long ago offered a very large reward for Sahib's apprehension, he has, until now, by the aid of native chiefs and friends, eluded arrest. He is, however, at last in the grasp of the law, and no punishment which can be meted out to him is too severe, in the face of the horrible crimes of which he has been guilty.

The London newspapers unite in demanding that exemplary vengeance be visited upon him, and the press and people everywhere will re-echo the same sentiment.

A LARGE and influential Convention of Reformers was held at Thamesville on Thursday. Every township was well represented, and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed. The Hon. A. McKellar, Provincial Secretary, who has so long served the constituency, was unanimously nominated as the Reform candidate for Bothwell. Opposition to him will be entirely useless.

Chas. Dickens, son, now in Ottawa, has been appointed to the inspectorship in the mounted police.
