

LITERARY NOTES.

Mgr. Taschereau has much of the Cardinal aspect—tall, immovable and keenly observant. The sight of him presiding over an university convocation sets one thinking of others of his princely order—mostly public men—who were fond of giving their patronage to letters and the arts. Readers of history may differ in opinion about several of these remarkable men, but their encouragement of literature and science must ever be remembered in their favour—Ximenes, Mazarin, Richelieu, and, in our day Pacca, Consalvi and Antonelli.—Laclede in Montreal Gazette.

Society in London is occupied with the discussion of the marriage of Mr. Willrid Ward with Miss Josephine Hope, which recently took place at the Oratory. The bridegroom is the second son of the late Dr. W. G. Ward, famous as one of the foremost men in the Oxford movement, as the inheritor of Northwood (an immense property in the Isle of Wight), as a social and literary guide of the very highest standing, and as editor at one time of the Dublin Review. The benedict himself is well known for the gifts of his pen, and has written several books—including that clever attack on Positivism, "The Clothes of Religion"—which have every right to pass his name down to posterity. A fitting helpmate he has found in his wife, the daughter of James Robert Hope-Scott, Q.C., another Oxford convert, who, strange to relate, was received into the Church the same day as Cardinal Manning, and at the same font in Farm Street. Miss Josephine Hope also wrote with good effect, and she is now known to be the author of a clever anonymous book—"In the Way"—which appeared lately, and set us all talking on account of its faithful portraits of distinguished living personages. Her mother was Lady Victoria Howard, sister of the Duke of Norfolk, by whom the bride was given away. The Oratory was crowded with the elite of Catholic England, and the boys of the Duke of Norfolk's school (to whom the bride used to teach Catechism) lined the passages and gave the happy couple a most imposing military salute.
