How They Found Bennie.

Dr. Wilder stood on the porch, talking with his wife, when John, the hired man, drove out of the barn in the new carriage, with Bennie sitting by his side.

"It is so warm, I would not let Bonnie go to day if he had not been promised a ride in the new photon, and Mrs. Wilder, him "Let him rough it a little, replied Dr.

began to comprehend some things as well as Bennie. "Tom is getting altogether too free with his remarks," he said, "he uses too much alang, also. You never mind what he says, Bennie."

They rode on over the smooth road damp with the heavy dew of the night before the air was sweet with the smell of meadow hay, and the sound of bird's wife, and said humbly, "Mary, you have songs in their ears. Left to himself, Bonne began to won der whether there was any way to present his father from having any more of the beverage that caused so much trouble to his mother, and led to such contemptuous romarks as those he had overheard from Tom. He got down from the seat into the read, and began to pick up stones and throw them at the fence of the cornheld opposite, and when he was tired of that, he watched some ants that were having a battle—and at last wondered if his father was ever coining out to go home. He took a little book cut of his mocket—a blank book that Ann the cook.
